Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

This is a bill providing for the payment of $600 to William Rule, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for money lost in the mail by fire at the burning of the steamer Pat Rogers on the morning of the 5th day of August, 1874, while the same was en route from Knoxville, Tennessee, to Cincinnati, Ohio. Rule was postmaster at Knoxville, and, on the 1st day of August, 1874, as was his duty under the regulations and instructions of the Post-Office Department, made up a package of money from his surplus money-order funds for the purpose of sending it to the Cincinnati office for deposit. It was composed of five notes of different national banks and one United States note, of the denomination of $100 each, the date and number of each being given. The testimony in the case goes to show that the package was made up and deposited in the mail, (registered letter No. 114, inclosed in registered-package envelope No. 105.) The proper receipts at every change in the route seem to have been passed between the route-agents, showing that the package went on board the Pat Rogers at Louisville, Kentucky, August 4, in charge of W. F. Hall, mail-agent on board the boat, who swears that he had the package in his possession, with twenty-five other registered packages, which he took out on the forecastle of the boat soon after she was found to be on fire, hoping that opportunity would offer to save them, but he swears that the boat did not land, and that he was compelled to leave them to be burned, while he saved himself as best he could.

DAVID M'COMB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2468) granting a pension to David McComb, late employé in the naval service of the United States.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David McComb, late employé in the naval service of the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. I move to amend by striking out lines 6 and 7 and in lieu thereof inserting the following:

David McComb, late an enlisted man in the naval service of the United States on the frigate Brandywine.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BERTHOLD LOEWENTHAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois, the sum of $14,850, or so much thereof as the said Loewenthal shall prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he has expended in the purchase of revenue-stamps used by him to stamp manufactured tobacco and snuff upon which a tax had previously been paid, under the revenue law in force at the time of their manufacture and sale, but which were made liable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868, thus requiring a double tax on the same tobacco and snuff.

The report was read, as follows:

That Berthold Loewenthal was, at the time of the passage of the act of Congress entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes," approved July 20, 1868, a wholesale dealer in tobacco, doing business in Chicago, Illinois, under the firm-name of B. Loewenthal & Co., and had on hand a quantity of smoking and plug tobacco and snuff upon which the taxes imposed by the laws of the United States in force prior thereto had been fully paid.

The affidavits of Mr. Loewenthal, his clerks, (Charles H. Chubback and Edward Loewenthal,) the assistant assessor of internal revenue, (James R. Hugenin,) and of Elias Adler and Elias Kaufman, (manufacturers of tobacco,) show that of this tobacco and snuff there remained in the possession of said Loewenthal on the 15th day of February, 1869, 77,585 pounds of smoking-tobacco and 7,601¼ pounds of snuff, and on the 1st day of July, 1869, 455 pounds of plug-tobacco, at which respective dates, by the provision of the act referred to, it became unlawful to sell said tobacco and snuff unless the same was packed and stamps had been purchased and affixed thereto, as required by the said act.

The affidavit of Mr. Loewenthal, and that of Edward Loewenthal, his clerk, corroborated by the affidavit of William Mumly, clerk in the office of the collector of internal revenue for the Chicago district, so far as his own recollection enables him to do so, (the books and papers of the office having been destroyed by fire,) show that he purchased, between the 15th day of February, A. D. 1869, and the 7th day of October, A. D. 1871, internal-revenue stamps, commonly called tobacco-stamps, of the value and for which he paid to the collector of internal revenue of the district the sum of $14,882.72, all of which tobacco-stamps he caused to be affixed to said tobacco and snuff and to be canceled.

It appears from the affidavit of William M. Loughlin, assistant assessor of internal revenue for the division where the goods in question were kept, that regular monthly inventories were made and returned by Mr. Loewenthal to his office showing the amounts of such tobacco and snuff remaining on hand on such respective dates, and that on the 9th day of August, 1869, he made personal examination of the unstamped smoking-tobacco, plug-tobacco, and snuff then in the possession of Loewenthal, manufactured prior to July 20, 1868, and found on hand, in Mr. Loewenthal's possession, of such goods, 63,697½ pounds of smoking-tobacco, 7,418 pounds of snuff, and 455 pounds of plug-tobacco, and that all of said goods were then contained in packages properly inspected, and all provisions of the internal-revenue laws of the United States, so far as these goods were concerned, appeared to have been fully complied with, and that on the 10th day of September, 1871, there remained in the possession of Mr. Loewenthal, of the goods in question, not more than 300 pounds of snuff.

The evidence Mr. Loewenthal submits seems to satisfactorily establish:

First. That the tobacco and snuff upon which he claims to have been required to pay additional taxes were manufactured prior to July 20, 1868.

Second. That all taxes and assessments thereon imposed by law prior to that date had been paid and the requirements of the law in regard to the same fully complied with.

Third. That after it became unlawful to sell or dispose of this tobacco and snuff without packing and affixing tobacco-stamps thereto he had on hand, unsold, of tobacco and snuff manufactured previous to July 20, 1868, upon which all United States taxes and assessments required by law prior to that date had been paid, 77,585 pounds of smoking-tobacco, 7,601¼ pounds of plug-tobacco, and 455 pounds of snuff.

Fourth. That in order to sell and dispose of the tobacco and snuff in compliance with the act of July 20, 1868, he was required to pay an additional tax thereon and purchase stamps and affix and cancel the same to the amount of $14,882.72.

The petition of Mr. Loewenthal and the proofs supporting its averments present for consideration the propriety and justice of imposing and exacting an additional tax upon tobacco and snuff which had paid the taxes thereon required by existing laws. That taxation should be uniform and its burden distributed as equally as possible upon the subjects of taxation will not be questioned.

Freshly-manufactured goods would come upon the market with great advantage over tax-paid goods as to the price at which they could be sold if the tax imposed by a new law was to be assessed upon both without regard to former tax.

Such taxation would not be uniform; it would unequally distribute its burdens. Consumers would pay as part of the cost the tax imposed upon goods thereafter manufactured, while the additional tax upon tax-paid goods previously manufactured would fall almost exclusively upon the dealers then holding them.

The act of July 20, 1868, changed the classification-rate of tax and manner of packing and stamping manufactured tobacco.

It provided that—

"After the 1st day of January, 1869, all smoking, fine-cut chewing tobacco, or snuff, and after the 1st day of July, 1869, all other manufactured tobacco of every description, shall be taken and deemed as having been manufactured after the passage of this act, and shall not be sold or offered for sale unless put up in packages and stamped as prescribed by this act, except at retail, by retail dealers, from wooden packages, stamped as provided for in this act; and any person who shall sell or offer for sale after the 1st day of January, 1869, any smoking, fine-cut chewing tobacco, or snuff, and after the 1st day of July, 1869, any other manufactured tobacco not so put up in packages and stamped, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years."

Some mode of packing and of identifying tax-paid tobacco was found indispensable to protect the revenue and prevent frauds. It was necessary to fix some definite time when tobacco should be put up into packages, as prescribed by the law, and fix it at such reasonable date thereafter as would enable the holders of tax-paid tobacco to dispose of their tobacco to actual consumers.

If it had been the intention to collect an additional tax from tax-paid tobacco previously manufactured, this provision would have been made to take effect immediately.

This is a case of individual hardship, where a wholesale dealer has been unable to dispose of previously-manufactured tobacco which had already paid a tax without packing and stamping, and necessarily paying an additional tax amounting to $14,882.72.

He shows that it was impossible for him to dispose of the tobacco within the time limited, except at a ruinous sacrifice. The Government has lost nothing by the tobacco remaining in his hands instead of being purchased by consumers.

The latter evidently have supplied themselves with other tobacco upon which the Government tax was paid, which tobacco would not have been taken by consumers, nor the tax paid thereon have been received by the Government, had they purchased within the limitation.

Section 57 of the act referred to allowed free stamps to be issued to owners of tax-paid distilled spirits on hand at the date of the passage of the law; and it would seem to have been equally just to have authorized the issue of similar stamps to the owners of tax paid tobacco previously manufactured.

Your committee therefore deem it just and equitable to refund to Mr. Loewenthal the amount of additional tax required of him to be paid upon the tobacco and snuff manufactured prior to the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, upon which a tax had already been paid, and which was in his possession when it became unlawful to dispose of the same without paying such additional tax.

There are questions of fact, however, which, in their judgment, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can pass upon more appropriately and scrutinize more carefully than Congress can upon the statements and evidence accompanying the bill.

The committee recommend that the Commissioner be authorized to examine the claim for refunding the tax in question, and allow and refund the same, or so much as, in his judgment, upon the proofs presented to him, should equitably and justly be repaid; and would recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Harrison, late assistant assessor in the second revenue district of Indiana, the compensation payable to assessors in said district, from the 4th day of March, 1867, until the 14th day of April, 1869.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the report may be read.

The report of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

It is shown that James G. Harrison was assistant assessor of internal revenue, regularly appointed, for the second collection district of Indiana, from the 1st day of September, 1862, until the 13th day of April, 1869; that during two years, one month, and nine days of that period, to wit, from March 4, 1867, to April 13, 1869, there being no assessor for said district, he served, by direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as acting assessor of said district, performing all of the duties pertaining to the office of assessor, and that for that period he received only the compensation allowed by law to assistant assessors, to wit, $5 per day. He now asks the payment of such balance as will realize to him the full pay of an assessor for the period during which he discharged the duties of that office. A letter from the Fifth Auditor to your committee, dated March 19, 1874, states that such balance would be $1,555.90.

Your committee believe that the petitioner, having performed the duties of the office of assessor, should receive the full pay provided by law for such services; and for that purpose they report back the bill (H. R. No. 1034) and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

APPLETON OAKSMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3183) allowing Appleton Oaksmith to prosecute certain claims before the Court of Claims.

The bill was read. It provides that the claim of Appleton Oaksmith against the United States for the alleged wrongful seizure and detention of the sea-going vessels Magnolia and Amelia, and their cargoes, by the authorities of the United States, in 1855, respectively in the ports of Mobile, in the United States, and Port au Prince, in the island of Hayti, be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims; and the said court is hereby authorized and directed, under its rules of practice, to examine into and adjudicate the said claim, and give judgment for the amount of damages, if any, directly resulting to said Appleton Oaksmith by reason of said seizure and detention, if found to have been unlawfully seized and detained; provided that said court shall be satisfied that said claimant has not been guilty of gross laches in prosecuting before Congress and in said court said claim for relief.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

That in 1855 the claimant, as owner of the sailing-vessels Magnolia and Amelia, started out from the city of New York laden with a large amount of arms and munitions of war. She cleared from New York for Saint Mary's, representing that she had no cargo, and only ballast, when her true destination was Saint Joseph Bay, a retired inlet on the coast of Florida. The character of her cargo seems to have been concealed from her crew. She touched at Key West, where the captain was fined $100 for omitting to obtain a clearance at New York. At Key West she cleared for Mobile, but she went to the bay of Saint Joseph, where she remained for many days, and was seized by a United States revenue-cutter and brought into Mobile. In the mean time a brother of the claimant went to New Orleans to try to sell the cargo to a party suspected of outfitting an invasion against Cuba.

The United States district attorney filed a libel against the vessel Magnolia in the United States district court, under the act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818. On the trial of this cause, while the circumstances surrounding the case were most suspicious, yet the proof, in the judgment of the court, was not sufficiently direct to sustain the proceeding, and the vessel and cargo were discharged. A similar proceeding was instituted against the vessel Amelia in the United States district court for the southern district of New York. This proceeding seems to have been compromised and dismissed on the agreement entered of record that the claimant here should forego any action for damages against the commercial agents for the seizure, or against those who brought the vessel to that port, or for their connection with the seizure.

The claimant alleges that, by reason of the premises, he has sustained damages by the wrongful detention of his vessels; that he, by lapse of time, has lost his right of action against the Government in the Court of Claims; and there is, perhaps, a question as to the jurisdiction of said court over the subject-matter of the claim. The bill for his relief asks that the Court of Claims be authorized and directed, under its rules of practice, to examine into and adjudicate the amount, if any, legally or equitably due the claimant by reason of the premises.

Assuming the facts to be, if the claimant is without such fault as has justly forfeited his equitable right to relief, no good reason is perceived why he should not be allowed to have his rights, whatever they are, of a lawful nature heard and adjudicated by the court, where both the rights of the claimant and of the Government may be protected under the guarantees of judicial procedure.

But the committee, in view of the circumstances of this case, and the lapse of time in its presentation here, deem it unwise to pass upon the question of laches, and to authorize the court to proceed in the investigation without an adjudication of that question; and they therefore report back the accompanying substitute for the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. HENDEE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing is in order but the objection which has been made by the gentleman from Vermont. The bill is not before the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not an amendment to the bill in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill, and the motion of the gentleman from Indiana cannot be entertained.

WILLIAM G. FORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 492) for the relief of William G. Ford, of Tennessee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, for the interest of the American heirs, which was not provided for in the award of the mixed commission under the treaty of Washington, of date September 24, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, and such court is authorized and directed to investigate the same, and to ascertain, determine, and adjudge the amount equitably due said William G. Ford as administrator of said John G. Robinson, deceased, if any, for the interest of said American heirs not provided for in said award; and said Court of Claims is authorized and required to receive as competent evidence the testimony already taken by said mixed commission in the said case.

The Committee of Claims reported the following amendments:

In lines 9 to 13 strike out these words, "and such court is authorized and directed to investigate the same, and to ascertain, determine, and adjudge the amount equitably due said William G. Ford as administrator of said John G. Robinson, deceased, if any, for the interest of said American heirs not provided for in said award;" and insert the words "relieved from the bar of the statute of limitations."

In line 15 strike out the words "and required" after the word "authorized," and the word "competent" after the word "as," and insert after the word "evidence" these words: "at its discretion."

At the end of the bill insert the following:

As though taken over again; and either party may take further and additional testimony under the order and rules of the court, as in other cases.

Amend the title by adding the words "administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

Under the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, between Great Britain and the United States, the petitioner, William G. Ford, as the administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, late a subject of Great Britain, prosecuted a claim before the mixed commission on British and American cases, and obtained an award of $20,638, in gold, that sum having been found due to Mary G. Barker, a subject of Great Britain, and one of the heirs of the said estate of Robinson.

The sum claimed before the commission was $88,250, with interest from date of seizure, March, 1863, up to date of award, September 24, 1873.

The heirs of the estate of said Robinson were four in number. Two of them were subjects of Great Britain, namely, Mrs. Barker and one who died in England before the award of the commission. The remaining two are American citizens: John G. Robinson, jr., and Eliza Lescesne.

The claim of these two heirs was, because of their American citizenship, dismissed by the mixed commission without prejudice.

The facts before recited are established by properly certified copies of the proceedings of the commission.

The administrator of the estate now asks that he be allowed to institute regular proceedings in the Court of Claims in respect to so much of the claim as relates to the interests of the American heirs.

The statute of limitations prevents the institution of the suit without authority of Congress.

The question arises, Why was not the suit instituted in the Court of Claims before the statute barred it and before the creation of the mixed commission? The explanation is simple and satisfactory.

Believing that, as heirs of a British subject, the only remedy was before a tribunal created for the hearing of the causes of such subjects, the representative of the estate instituted no proceedings until the mixed commission was created. He then sought his remedy, with result as before stated, that the commission granted relief to the foreign subject, but dismissed the cause of the American citizens. Whether the remedy lay before an international commission or the Court of Claims was not determined until the commission rendered its decision, which left the American heirs without remedy.

This is clearly a case where the statute of limitations works an injustice, and the request of the administrator to be allowed to sue in the Court of Claims seems most reasonable.

Your committee respectfully return the petition with a bill, which they recommend do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

There being no objection, the bill and amendments were laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

FLOYD C. BABCOCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Floyd C. Babcock.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Floyd C. Babcock, of Oconomowoc, Wisconsin, the sum of $556.55, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to compensate the said Babcock for services rendered by him while acting as deputy United States marshal in the Indian country in arresting and transporting four murderers to Fort Smith, Arkansas.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the committee rise and report the bills which have been laid aside to be reported for favorable action.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 19; no quorum voting.

So (further count not being demanded) the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration sundry bills which they had directed him to report with the recommendation that they do pass, some with and some without amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bills which have been reported by their titles, except those reported with amendments, and, if there be no objection, they will be considered as passed.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, without amendment, were severally read by their titles the third time and passed:

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know if there is any report accompanying that bill; and if so, I would like to hear it read.

The report was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was put on the passage of the bill; and on a division there were—ayes 42, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SAMPSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 56, noes 45.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further count being insisted on, the bill is passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT., from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Monday next, after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

ADDRESSES UPON THE DEATH OF HON. H. H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, a member of the House of Representatives, and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Starkweather to accompany the same.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTERS' UNION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back a remonstrance against the Printers' Union in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The motion was agreed to.

WILSON M'CANDLESS.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that they be concurred in, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

Strike out the words "the Hon." before "Wilson McCandless;" also add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the said McCandless shall resign his office within six months next after the passage of this act.

The bill, as amended by the Senate, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of section 714 of the Revised Statutes be, and they are hereby, extended and made applicable to Wilson McCandless, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, in consequence of his physical disability, notwithstanding he has not attained the age of seventy years: Provided, That the said McCandless shall resign his office within six months next after the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRISON. This bill ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HUNTON. I have just reported it from that committee, with a recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to inquire of the gentleman reporting this bill why it is that a provision is put in that this judge shall resign in six months?

Mr. MORRISON. They want the appointment of his successor themselves.

Mr. HUNTON. It is very important for the dispatch of the business of this district that this bill should pass as soon as possible. This judge is an old man, but not quite old enough to be retired under the present law. He is not physically able to hold the court, and the business of the district requires that this bill shall pass at this time.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 34.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted, and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUNTON and Mr. HEWITT of Alabama were appointed.

Before the tellers took their places,

Mr. HOPKINS said: When this bill was before under consideration in this House a statement was made of the long and efficient services of this distinguished jurist. He is within two years of having reached the age when he could retire under existing law without further action by Congress. His vocal powers have become paralyzed, and he cannot now conduct the business of the court. He is poor, thus attesting the integrity with which he has administered his office. The public business is seriously injured for the want of a judge to preside in that court. Judge McKennon, of the circuit court, is now holding the court in this district, to the delay of the business in his own court. Next week Judge Strong, of the Supreme Court, will go there to relieve him. That shows the delay in the transaction of the public business in that court because of the failure to pass this bill. Judge McCandless has no means of support other than his salary as judge.

Objection is made by some to the amendment of the Senate requiring Judge McCandless to resign within six months after the passage of this act. I have heard this explanation of that amendment: Judge EDMUNDS, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, says that a few years ago he obtained the passage of a similar bill for the benefit of a judge in Vermont, who declined to take advantage of it and is still on the bench. For that reason, he wants the time fixed within which this judge shall take advantage of this act or it shall become inoperative. That is the reason for this amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment making it "twelve months" instead of "six months."

Mr. CONGER. One of the principal reasons for the passage of this bill was that this officer might resign his place as judge so that another might be appointed and the business of the court might proceed in that district. I think the limitation proposed by the Senate amendment is a very proper one. If this judge will not resign his place within six months after the passage of this act and accept the proposition which this bill enables him to accept, the bill should not be operative. I would be opposed to the passage of this bill without the amendment, for the reason for its passage is that the business of the court might be disposed of. To extend the time to twelve months, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] would be to delay the transaction of business for that length of time, and would be unjust to the suitors in that court. With such an amendment, for my own part, I should be opposed to the passage of the bill.

The amendment of Mr. SPRINGER was not agreed to.

The question was again taken upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and upon a division there were—ayes 86, noes 43.

Mr. SINGLETON. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOPKINS and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 88, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is in order, I desire to move that this bill and the Senate amendment thereto be laid on the table. Before making that motion, I wish to say——

Mr. CONGER. I believe the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not yet submitted that motion. Before doing so I desire to say that this is a bill which extends the civil-pension list, inaugurated a few years ago. Up to a few years ago a civil-pension list was unknown to this Government. It has been but recently inaugurated. It was proposed, as I remember, in the early history of this country to prohibit by a constitutional provision the creation of a civil-pension list in this Republic as antagonistic to the ideas of republican government in view of the experience of the Old World. I have heard it stated once or twice upon this floor, in connection with measures like this, that it was said by one of the brightest ornaments of the country of that day that when the American people were willing to organize a civil-pension list it was scarcely necessary to talk about republican government. We shall begin to lose sight of the high duty of providing for those who have imperiled life in the service of the Army and the Navy when we begin to swell up a civil-pension list, retiring gentlemen upon large pensions who during a long series of years have received compensation far beyond the usual compensation received by citizens engaged in the private pursuits of life. I simply want to call the attention of the House again to the character of this bill or of the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to a question of order. Is discussion in order while the House is trying to ascertain whether there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only propositions that the House can entertain, inasmuch as it has been disclosed that a quorum has not appeared, are a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can entertain no motion except a motion to adjourn or for a call of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, was granted leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. PHELPS was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of ill health.

Mr. HARTRIDGE was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

Mr. SINNICKSON was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers in the case of Mrs. A. H. Thompson, of New York, now before the Committee on War Claims.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and on a division, there were—ayes 88, noes 40.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

St. John, of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARTIN H. AMESBURY.

Mr. NEW also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of Martin H. Amesbury; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL STATION ON BLOCK ISLAND.

Mr. HEREFORD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back sundry petitions praying for the establishment of a signal station and telegraph on Block Island, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC MARINE SCHOOLS.

Mr. GIBSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3381) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of public marine schools," approved June 20, 1874, so as to extend its provisions to the ports of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MARY CLARKE BARD.

Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3382) granting a pension to Mary Clarke Bard, of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS, ETC., OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a letter from the commissioners of claims, transmitting, in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives dated May 1, all complaints and affidavits made against the clerk of their board, or any special agent appointed by them, on file in their office.

This is in answer to a resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. GLOVER,] and is accompanied by a large bundle of papers. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee on War Claims, and unless some other reference is suggested that will be ordered.

Mr. CONGER. The subject-matter of this resolution was discussed in the Committee on War Claims, and I believe the resolution was prepared by that committee to obtain this information.

The letter and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order would seem to be the bill which was pending at the adjournment last evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. Yesterday was private-bill day, and the subject pending at the adjournment last evening came up under the call for private bills This is not a private-bill day. I submit that the regular order is the business pending on the preceding day, and I desire therefore to submit the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the special order to consider the post-office appropriation bill, and in any event the motion would be in order that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to rule, in accordance with what has been ruled by the Speaker of the House heretofore, that the business pending at the adjournment of the House yesterday does not come up as unfinished business until next Friday.

The Chair would add that the disposition of unfinished business is of high privilege, recognized and certain. It applies to the unfinished business on private-bill days, but that business is not resumed until the next private-bill day. (See note on page 175, Digest.)

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN's motion, it was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. It might have been proper that before the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole an order should have been made to close general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for closing debate has been fixed; but the House on Thursday last gave the gentleman from Indiana who now has the floor permission to conclude his remarks, and after he has finished his remarks the general debate on this bill will be closed.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the committee. His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate upon this bill is now closed by order of the House. The bill will now be considered by paragraphs for amendment, and the Clerk will read the bill for that purpose.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For office of the Post-master-General:
For mail depredations and special agents, $110,000.

Mr. WALDRON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$110,000" and inserting "$160,000." I ask the Clerk to read a letter addressed by the Postmaster-General to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1876.

SIR: In reply to the communication of Mr. Robert J. Stevens, clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, of the 22d instant, requesting by direction of the committee a re-arrangement of certain items in the estimate for the expenses of this Department, I respectfully submit the following facts for the information of the committee.

The appropriation for mail depredations and special agents cannot, from the character of the service, be separated so as to specify a particular sum for each. While employed primarily to detect and punish depredations on the mails and other violations of the postal laws, the special agents are at the same time required to attend to a multiplicity of miscellaneous work connected with every branch of the postal service.

Special agents are required to investigate all irregularities reported as occurring on the mail routes of the country, many of which are located in remote and obscure districts.

The instruction of newly appointed postmasters in their duties and the correction of errors that frequently occur through carelessness or incompetency also occupy considerable of the special agents' time; and they are not unfrequently called upon to take possession of post-offices and discharge the duties appertaining thereto for a considerable period, owing to the removal of postmasters for alleged criminal or other sufficient cause.

It is made a part of the duty of special agents, in cases of controversy, to examine and report the proper location of post-office sites, to arrange terms for leases, and to superintend transfers. This important service requires thorough investigation and a careful consideration of all the surroundings, and intrusted to the special agents, who are free from local influences, both the Department and communities are better served than otherwise could be possible.

The small force of special agents designated for the money-order division is not able promptly to investigate all of the cases of alleged fraud and irregularity that occur therein, and it is of daily occurrence that the special agents of the depredation force are employed to assist in the work connected therewith.

As an illustration of the results accomplished by the force, the mail this morning (March 24) brings reports of eight arrests made by our agents in different parts of the country: a mail-messenger in Connecticut, a postmaster in Georgia, and a gang of six burglars in Eastern Pennsylvania who have for a number of months been raiding through several counties of that State and operating particularly on post-offices. The same agent who effected this wholesale capture also obtained the information which led to the recent apprehension of several counterfeiters in the same neighborhood.

In addition to the great amount of miscellaneous work briefly outlined above, the force nearly averages an arrest for robbery and other penal violations of law for every working-day in the year, and in a large majority of cases the arrests are followed by conviction.

The duties of special agents are always arduous, and often perilous, and in their ramifications extend over every branch of the service, and upon a faithful discharge of those the success of the Postal Establishment in a great measure depends.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
Chairman Subcommittee Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. WALDRON. I have to add only this——

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to my colleague, [Mr. WALDRON.]

Mr. WALDRON. I have only to add to what the Postmaster-General has written that he asked to have $160,000 appropriated for this purpose for the next fiscal year. The amount expended under this item for the year ending June 30, 1873, was $158,000, and for the year ending June 30, 1875, $165,000. Notwithstanding this recommendation of the Postmaster-General, actually asking for a less amount for this service than was expended for the year ending June 30, 1875, the Committee on Appropriations by this bill propose to appropriate only $110,000, or $50,000 less than the amount that has been expended annually for the last two years.

Mr. HUBBELL. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. STONE. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I listened very attentively to the reading of the very interesting letter from the Postmaster-General, but I did not observe in that letter any statement as to the salary of these special agents. Now I do know that their salary has been fixed at $1,000 a year, while their per diem has amounted to $1,825 a year, which I claim is not contemplated under the law. The gentleman has stated that $165,000 was expended in the year ending June 30, 1875, for the payment of special agents. In point of fact, but $160,923.49 was expended, being $923.43 in excess of the appropriation. The amount paid to these special agents as salary was $87,481.31; as per diem, $61,840.50; as incidental expenses, $9,746.73; making a total, according to these details furnished me by the Postmaster-General himself, of $159,068.54—a difference of $8,374.76 between the amount stated in the published report and the subsequent report in detail.

Now, it will be observed that an amount equal to 75 per cent. of all that was paid as salary was expended as per diem the per diem in some cases being actually greater than the salary. Allowing for the salaries of forty-six special agents and for paying them for the time they are actually away from headquarters, I am satisfied after careful investigation that the sum indicated in the bill is ample, unless we propose to pay these officers $5 per day for each and every day in the year.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that my friend from Michigan [Mr. WALDRON] is under a misapprehension. Eleven agents are paid out of the transportation fund and only forty-six out of this fund. This will allow them their salaries and $790 a year each for expenses.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WALDRON, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 49, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to postmasters, $6,500,000.

Mr. WALDRON. I move to amend the clause just read by making the amount of the appropriation $7,100,000. I think that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, will concur with me in the propriety and justice of this amendment. The amount actually paid as compensations to postmasters during the present fiscal year will be between $7,700,000 and $7,800,000. Now, assuming that the new plan proposed by the committee for adjusting salaries of postmasters is adopted, it will result in a reduction of about $700,000; and that sum deducted from the amount paid this year as compensation of postmasters leaves $7,100,000 as the amount necessary, even if the new plan for adjusting salaries of postmasters be adopted. I have therefore moved to add $600,000 to the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. The expenditure last year for this purpose was $7,348,000. After a careful examination of the figures, the committee have come to the conclusion that the amount named in the bill will be sufficient.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out this $6,500,000 and inserting $7,000,000. If I rightly understood the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has advocated this bill, he intimated that he thought the amount named in this paragraph too low and that an amendment should be suggested. I am satisfied that the amount ought to be increased. The sum fixed in the bill is evidently upon the basis of the year ending June 30, 1875; but these appropriations are for the year ending June 30, 1877; and after a lapse of two years, with an enlarged business, the number of post-offices having increased over a thousand a year, a larger appropriation must evidently be necessary. We cannot put back a full-grown man into the boy's clothes.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following.

Provided, That no postmaster whose duty it is to distribute weekly so many as six mails shall be paid a less annual compensation than $50; and where the number of mails distributed exceeds six per week the Postmaster-General shall pay the postmasters at such places salaries commensurate with the work performed.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. MILLER.

The question was then taken; and there were—ayes 60, noes 67, no quorum voting.

Mr. RUSK. I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUSK. I insist on tellers, unless the gentleman from Indiana is going to move an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was going to submit an amendment, but not making the amount nearly so large as has been proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further count is insisted upon, the amendment will be regarded as rejected.

Mr. RUSK. I insist upon a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RUSK and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 59, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. In support of an amendment which has been offered, it has been said that it was not easy to foretell what would be the effect of the changes proposed to be made in the law in regard to salaries. An adversity of opinion has existed as to the effect of the new rule which we propose to adopt; but while there is some difference as to the result a majority of the committee believe that $6,800,000 will fully cover the required expenditure. I therefore move to strike out "five" and insert "eight;" so as to make the amount $6,800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,200,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby directed to cause a careful inquiry to be made into the rates of compensation now paid to clerks in post-offices, with a view to a more equitable adjustment and reduction thereof, and, if such re-arrangement is practicable, to put the same in force from and after July 1, 1876: Provided, That such adjustment shall in no case involve an increase over and above the present aggregate compensation as provided in this act.

For payments to letter-carriers, $1,650,000; Provided, That hereafter the free-delivery system shall not be established in cities of less than forty thousand inhabitants, and may be continued only in cities of not less than forty thousand inhabitants where now established by law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move in line 27 to strike out "$200,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$650,000," so it will read "$3,650,000."

Mr. Chairman, the amount spent last year was $3,500,000 for compensation of clerks in post-offices. The proposed increase is $150,000, making $3,650,000. In the main, I concur in the proposition of the committee in reducing the salaries of postmasters. It cuts many from $4,000 down to $3,000, and some still lower. It cuts many from $2,500 to $2,300, and some as low as $2,000. The truth is, outside of a few cities, perhaps, where they have been getting $4,000 a year, postmasters who got over $2,000 a year had to devote all of their time to the performance of their duties, and had to draw largely upon their salaries to help pay for necessary clerk hire. I have an office in my mind, in my district, Champagne, and the allowance for clerk hire in that city of six thousand population is only $300, and the postmaster has to my recollection for years had to pay largely out of his own pocket. This cuts off at both ends, so far as that class of officers is concerned. When, as you announce, you reduce in round numbers $800,000 on salaries of postmasters, it occurs to me you ought not to diminish the fund out of which the clerk hire is to be paid.

It may be replied that there have been abuses in some of these four-thousand-dollar offices. That may be so, but there are many offices where there have been no abuses, and where as gentlemen well know they have not been able to get the amount of clerk hire in the appropriation heretofore that their respective offices ought to have. Therefore I think it is right when you cut off $800,000 from the salaries of postmasters you ought not to cut down this appropriation for clerk hire. It is burning the candle at both ends.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, in this matter of clerk hire in post-offices, determined they would adopt the 10 per cent. rule as to salaries. They believed everywhere, in all the Departments of the Government, by reason of the reduction in value of the necessaries of life and the general depression of business, it was proper to make reduction at least to that extent. They did not follow the rule which had been observed in the other Departments of the 20-per-cent. reduction in force, but have merely allowed a reduction of 5 per cent at first, making in all a reduction of 15 per cent., and finally coming to a reduction of 10 per cent. on last year.

Increase in railroad transportation does not necessarily produce increase in clerk hire. The gentleman from Illinois says that he finds in some places the postmaster at a salary of $2,000, and he gave one instance——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There are many such instances.

Mr. BLOUNT. He says there are many such instances where the salary of the postmaster is $2,000, while the allowance for clerk hire is only $300, and that the postmaster has to draw on his salary for the purpose of paying clerks rendered necessary by the duties of the office. There are many such instances where postmasters follow other avocations and have their time bestowed in other pursuits. It is known to the committee, if we are to come down to instances, that there are many places where the postmaster receives $2,000 a year who absolutely does nothing, while all the work of the post-office is done by the clerks. If I may be permitted to refer to instances—and I think much light may be thrown upon the subject in that way—I know of two instances in the congressional district of my colleague where the postmaster has about that salary and does not do one iota of work, the work being done by the clerks themselves.

There is a very unequal distribution in the matter of clerk hire. We found in many places there was too much clerk hire, too much in number and too much in salary. It has been the habit we found, to put men in these positions because of some political connection. I submit, therefore, to the gentleman from Illinois, in respect to the class of officers he speaks of, whether, if the real wants of such offices are all he seeks, he could not find young men of business qualifications who would take hold of those offices and consider themselves well paid by the salary without regard to any allowance for clerk hire?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the gentleman want me to answer?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have only five minutes, and cannot yield.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman asks me a question he should permit me to answer it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand, and I think the gentleman from Illinois will understand, that very often in the course of these discussions arguments are put in the form of interrogations. I am not alarmed at the answer the gentleman may see fit to give. I would be glad to yield to him if I had time; but I can say but little in five minutes.

I think it will be found as regards that class of officers to whom the gentleman refers, having those small salaries, that the great majority of them have other avocations. I have no doubt that will be found to be true, and it will be further found that if the Department seek to have this work done by the young business men of the community, they will have no trouble in getting men to do it.

Mr. PRATT rose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] will renew it.

Mr. PRATT. I renew the amendment.

I wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia on this proposition. I certainly hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will prevail. The fact is, as is known to every western member of Congress, that it is in many instances absolutely impossible to obtain clerks in offices that need them very badly. I know that in my own State during the short time that I have been in Congress my attention has frequently been called to the necessity of clerks in post-offices that but a few years ago were very small affairs, receiving possibly but one or two mails a week, and needing no clerk, but which under the rapid increase of population in that State have now become important offices, which have become distributing offices, and now transact a large amount of business, frequently receiving night mails. And I know of post-offices in my own district where the postmaster is obliged to be up all night long almost every night in order to receive and dispatch the mails. And even in such offices as those no clerk is allowed, and the only way the postmasters can get along is by putting in some son, daughter, or other member of his family to assist him in doing his work; and unless he is so fortunate as to have a member of his family who is capable, and who can be safely intrusted with the duty, he is obliged to spend his entire time, day and night, in the discharge of those duties.

Whenever an application is made in such cases to the Department for a clerk, the invariable reply is that there is no money, that the appropriation does not justify them in paying additional salaries. Gentlemen seem not to comprehend the wants of that rapidly growing and increasing section of the country, where a post-office one year may receive but one or two mails a week and the next year may receive a dozen, coming in from all directions, and some of them in the night-time. Now there should be provision for enabling the postmasters in such offices to properly discharge their functions.

Clerks are urgently needed in many offices in my State, and yet they cannot be obtained, so the Department tells us, for want of funds. Now this strikes directly at the appropriate and efficient administration of the postal service there, and when you touch the postal service you touch the people in a very tender place. The mails have become an absolute necessity to the people of this country. They are not a luxury but a necessity, and ample and generous appropriations ought to be made to sustain every branch of this service. And I condemn and will not support any bill that attempts to stint this branch of the public service, this branch of it which has become such a necessity to the people and that mingles with their daily life and business as this branch of the public service does.

Now, Mr. Chairman, every gentleman, I believe, by consulting the wants of his own district, especially in the newer States of this country, will see the justice of these remarks; and I beg our friends not to cut us off in this important branch with an insufficient appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a very moderate reduction, and one which leaves the amount appropriated quite adequate. There are not only abuses in the expenditure of this money, but there is gross favoritism shown in the offices as to the allowances to postmasters. And as gentlemen have been citing instances, I will cite one.

Take New Berne, North Carolina, in regard to which I have the figures. In 1860 the expenditures on that post-office were $1,761; the receipts were then $3,444. The actual allowances to-day at that office are $1,600, instead of $1,761, as they were in 1860; and the receipts are $6,900. Thus instead of the increased receipts of $3,450 going in the aggregate or in some relative ratio to the Government, nearly $2,900 of the amount goes to the increased salaries; the difference in the allowances in these two years being the difference between $1,760 and $4,600.

And so it is my belief this thing runs throughout the United States. And here I may just mention another instance as to a post-office in my State. In the city of Scranton there are four postmasters, and when we ask why that is, we are told that the political pressure is so great, that we cannot abolish three of them when there is no need of more than one. Now take this city. There might have been a propriety in having a postmaster and clerks in the town of Georgetown, when Washington and Georgetown were separate cities, but under the consolidation of these two cities there is no occasion but for one postmaster.

I hope that the abuses in this system throughout the United States will be corrected, and I trust that the moderate amount in the bill, which is a reduction of 10 per cent., will not be increased at all, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DANFORD. I renew the amendment. I only desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a word. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in his remarks said comparisons or illustrations were unfair and they did not prove much. I happen to have before me, printed by the committee, the present compensation of the postmasters of Ohio and the salaries under the reduction proposed by the Postmaster-General and the salaries proposed under this bill. I have before me the case of one city in my district, the city of Bellaire, in which the present compensation of the postmaster is $2,400, and under the bill it is $1,800. Now at that office I know that the postmaster is required to keep constantly three clerks. There is an allowance of $400 for clerk hire at that office. The postmaster pays $1,200 for clerk hire, being $800 from his salary; and when you take $800 from the salary of the postmaster at that place, as fixed by the bill, you leave $1,000 for his salary. That is a small compensation, in my judgment, for a city of seven thousand inhabitants.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask the gentleman whether the postmaster or clerks have any other employment?

Mr. DANFORD. None of them; their entire time is devoted to that business. This may be an exceptional case. In the city of Steubenville, in the district which I have the honor to represent, the reduction of salary is $1,100 as proposed by the bill. I am not informed what the allowance for clerk hire at that office is. I cannot speak as to whether the postmaster is compelled there to pay any part of his salary for clerk hire or not. I presume he does, but cannot speak so certainly as I can of the city in my own county. I believe that it is not right to cut off at both ends. I agree in the main in the policy of cutting down the salaries of postmasters, for I think in many instances the postmasters' compensation has been too much, but in my experience there has not been any large abuse in the matter of clerk hire; there is but little allowed that is not an absolute necessity in the interests of the service, and I think it unsafe and unwise to cut down the appropriation for clerk hire while we are so largely cutting down the salary of the postmasters. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will prevail.

Mr. BLOUNT. I appreciate what the gentleman from Ohio has said. I know that not only in that instance to which he has referred but in many instances clerk hire is not what it ought to be. One instance from the State of Michigan was brought to the attention of the committee; but we found a large number of instances where the amount paid for clerk hire was larger than the service demanded. I have no doubt there ought to be a re-adjustment of the service in this particular.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, as renewed by Mr. DANFORD; and on a division there were ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For payments to letter-carriers, $1,650,000: Provided, That hereafter the free-delivery system shall not be established in cities of less than forty thousand inhabitants, and may be continued only in cities of not less than forty thousand inhabitants where now established by law.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I rise to a point of order, and the point of order which I make is in reference to the latter portion of that paragraph which I believe to be in contravention of Rule 120 of this House, for the reasons that it changes the existing law, and for the further reason that it does not appear on the face of it that it comes within the line of retrenchment of expenditures. The latter clause of Rule 120 is in the following words:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now I admit that this proviso is germane to the bill, but I deny that prima facie it shows a retrenchment of expenditures, and in order to have it sustained it must appear upon the face of the paragraph itself and not by virtue of any extraneous calculation that it will work a retrenchment of expenditures. This rule has received an interpretation by Speaker KERR, and in support of what I say I ask that an extract from the ruling of the Speaker upon this question, when raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill and the section of that bill for the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department, be read. The Speaker in that case decided that inasmuch as it did not appear on the face of the bill itself that there was a retrenchment of expenditures the point of order was good, and that he could not go outside of the bill to ascertain whether it would work a retrenchment of expenditures or not.

Now whether, if this proviso be enacted into law, it will work retrenchment is a matter for argument, because if the letter-carrier system is abolished we all know that it will necessitate the appointment of additional clerks in every post-office where the system now exists, and we know further that it reduces the value of local postage 50 per cent. We know that in addition to that it reduces the volume of local postage, because business men circulate through this medium their circulars and advertisements. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, if the letter-carrier system is abolished it will necessitate the building or renting of additional establishments for the use of the post-office. That is the case in my own city, where there is but one post-office for three separate municipal corporations. If the carrier system does not exist, we should necessarily be compelled to have two additional post-offices, with all the officers and clerks attached to them. It will be seen, therefore, that it is a question to be ascertained by calculation whether or not, if this proviso becomes a law, it will lead to retrenchment or not. I now ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I have marked in the ruling of Speaker KERR to which I have referred.

Now, the Chair cannot look forward into that legislation and say, upon anything that appears upon the face of this section, that such legislation will in all respects coincide with, sustain, or affirm the provisions of this section and carry out the proposed retrenchments indicated in it. In other words, the Chair desires it to be distinctly understood that the point upon which his decision in this case turns is that from the face of the section it does not appear that the provision comes within the requirement of this rule, which is that it shall be germane to the subject-matter of the bill and "shall retrench expenditures." It does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the bill or the laws of the land or the usual and customary mode of proceeding of this body that this section, if enacted in this bill, will retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] raises the question of order which he has stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard for a moment upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear any gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The last three lines of the paragraph just read covers the whole decision, and I ask the Clerk to read the last three lines.

The Clerk read as follows:

It does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the bill or the laws of the land or the usual and customary mode of proceeding of this body that this section, if enacted in this bill, will retrench expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. The substance of that paragraph is that it shall appear on the face of the bill that it promotes a retrenchment of expenditures. I think that this proposition very clearly comes within the rule. The law of the land provides for letter-carriers, and provides for salaries to them to the extent of $1,800,000; that appears clearly. What does the Speaker mean by other propositions? Nothing more is necessary than the statement of the bill, which reduces the appropriation made by the law of the land. That would be the end of it.

What is the meaning of the proposition of the Speaker, "to be ascertained also by the general course of procedure in the House?" He refers, I suppose, to such reports as come to the House under the law. The present law provides a free-delivery system for cities with a population of 30,000. The proviso of this bill now under consideration requires a city to have a population of 40,000 or upward to entitle it to this free-delivery system.

Now that this proviso, if enacted into law, will abolish a multitude of officers is an inevitable proposition. Does the abolition of these officers reduce expenditures? As to the effect of this proviso, we are to look to the reports that come before this House under the law in order to ascertain whether it will or will not redrce expenditures. I refer the Chair to the report of the Postmaster-General, which states that but three of the free-delivery cities of this country meet their current expenses by the local postage, the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. In all the other cities having the free-delivery system the expenses exceed the local postage.

I refer also to a report coming officially to this House, showing that the effect of this proviso will be to reduce expenditures to the extent of $103,701.62. That is an official report from the Postmaster-General. I take it for granted that the meaning of the proposition of the Speaker, that retrenchment must appear upon the face of the provision from the law of the land and from the usual course of procedure in the House, is that we must consult the reports that come officially before us. Now, the official reports before the House, of which the Chairman must take official notice, show that the abolition of the letter-carrier system in fifty-five towns would reduce the expenditures more than $100,000.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say a few words upon this point of order, as the proviso will affect a city in the district I represent, for the merits of the proposition can be discussed upon the question of order precisely as it would upon the proviso itself.

It has been conceded, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] himself concedes, that a retrenchment of expenditures does not appear upon the face of the proviso in this bill. The gentleman has read from the decision made the other day by the honorable Speaker of this House that the question of retrenchment is to be decided upon a comparison of that which appeared upon the face of the amendment then before the House with other provision of the law of the land, a point then distinctly presented in the argument as in the decision. Now what I have to say will be directed to the question whether upon comparison of this proviso with the law of the land there appears any specific and positive reduction of expenditures under this proviso, because upon the face of the provision there does not appear to be any retrenchment.

Upon this question the Postmaster-General helps us materially. I refer gentlemen to Miscellaneous Document No. 88, which comes to us from the Senate, which contains tables and letters from the Postmaster-General. On page 28 of that document, referring to the fifty-five towns having a free-delivery system mentioned on that and the preceding pages, he says that the percentage of the regular office expenditure was 27.80, and the percentage of the cost of the free-delivery system was 14.68; or about one-third of the total expenses of the offices was to be charged to the free-delivery system.

In another document which he sent to us he states that the increase of receipts from the delivery of letters is at least 75 per cent. and "perhaps more;" that is, the large gain resulting from the operation of this system of delivery is 75 per cent. of the whole receipts. Now if that be correct—and I have had but a moment to examine the subject, and gentlemen of course will be able to state whether it is correct or not—the absolutely certain conclusion is this: while the cost of the free delivery of letters in fifty-five or more towns is but one-third of the entire expenses of the post-offices in those towns, the increased receipts resulting from the system, if it be the same as in all the towns where letters are delivered by carriers, will be 75 per cent. of the total receipts of those offices. In that case there is no certain reduction of expenditures to result from the adoption of this proviso. Therefore, so far as that goes, it seems to me that it must be conclusive upon the honorable chairman that this proviso will not work any reduction of expenditures, compared with the receipts of the Department, and that must of course be the basis of calculation and conclusion. It will be a reduction of a small number of officers employed and the salaries paid them, and a loss of 75 per cent. of the gross receipts for postage. That certainly is not such retrenchment as could justly give this proviso a privileged character over any other proposition that can be moved to this section of the bill.

But that is not all. The honorable Speaker alluded the other day to the necessity there might be for further legislation in order to complete the system of measures for the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department, and upon the character of that new legislation would depend the question of retrenchment. That necessity exists in regard to the proposition. It proposes to change the organization of the Post-Office Department for the delivery of letters. In the city of Lynn, which I represent, there are about twenty-five thousand people, the most of them mechanics and working-people, men, women, and children; they are actively engaged in various mechanical and manufacturing pursuits; they are natives of different parts of the country, and in correspondence with all parts of the country. The letter-carriers bring their letters to them. There are very few cities that contribute more to the revenues of the Post-Office Department than the active, industrious, and intelligent people of Lynn.

Now, if you take this letter-carrier system away from the 25,000 people of Lynn, you compel them to restrict their correspondence and thus diminish the postal revenues or to go every day to the post-office for their letters. Will the present post-office accommodations there be sufficient for them? Will there be sufficient room for boxes, or sufficient windows through which to deliver letters addressed to these 25,000 people? Will it not be necessary to enlarge every part of the post-office establishment in that city? And will not the same necessity arise in every other city affected by this proviso?

I state the matter strongly, it is true; but every gentleman can judge whether or not I state it too strongly. Can the honorable members of the Committee on Appropriations say how their own cities and towns may be affected by this proviso? When the increased accommodations which will be required for these people, who are now served with their letters at their homes, are made in the several post-office establishments in the various towns affected by this proviso, is it not perfectly evident that there must be from this item alone a largely-increased expenditure?

The Postmaster-General has called our attention to other facts. I have referred to one, the increased receipts of the Post-Office, which, as I read his communication, is about 75 per cent., and is the creation of the letter-carrier's delivery, or a diversion from private enterprises to the Post-Office to be credited to this branch of the service; and if we strike off the letter-carriers altogether he says that the diminished cost of the system will be only $297,000 less than the cost if the carriers are included in all the cities and towns where the system has been established.

I have shown what additional charge may possibly arise from the necessity of increased accommodations in the way of buildings and appurtenances thereto. I call attention to another fact to which the Postmaster-General has adverted, the increased cost of regular service. Who is to deliver letters addressed to these twenty-five hundred people at the post-office? It must be done by an increased number of clerks. How many; who can tell us? What will be their cost; who can tell us? That is one item. Then we must take into consideration the money which in the event of the abandonment of this system would be lost to the revenues of the Post-Office Department by a resort to the telegraph instead of the mails. Almost every day men resort to the telegraph when it is inconvenient for them to write letters. The Postmaster-General recognizes the fact that the increased conveniences and advantages of the letter-carrier system increased the receipts of the Post-Office Department by diminishing the inducement to resort to the telegraph. The loss from diminution of correspondence is another consideration. If letters are delivered to the people at their houses at intervals of two or three hours every day, the correspondence of the people is thereby increased; nobody can doubt it. This goes therefore to increase the receipts without greatly increasing the cost. If you make the change here proposed you diminish correspondence and to that extent reduce the receipts of the Department. Is it intended that reduction of receipts shall give a privileged character to legislative propositions over those that increase them?

But, sir, there is one other point to which the Postmaster-General alludes which cannot be overlooked by the Chairman or by the House. He says:

> It is believed that at least 75 per cent., and perhaps more, of this amount received should be regarded, if not as a creation of the carrier-delivery system, as a diversion from private enterprises to the post-office, and should therefore be credited to this branch of the service.

The Postmaster-General speaks from experience; and I can say from what has come within my knowledge that, if you take away from the people these conveniences, the express companies will supply them; and unless you by law prohibit private enterprise from supplying the wants of the people in this respect, (which the House would very reluctantly do,) you throw into the control of the express companies that now exist or may be organized for this purpose the very duty that is now performed by the Post-Office Department through the letter-carriers.

One word more and I leave this question. How shall we estimate the time consumed in visits to the post-office by the people of a city like Lynn, with 23,000 or 25,000 inhabitants, and the value of that time to them if appropriated to other labor or to pleasures? The time thus expended by the people in going to and from the post-office should be considered in making this change; and if this loss of time be included in the estimate of cost, then most clearly and absolutely there will be no reduction of expenditures, whether we consider the proposition on its face or whether we compare it with any other provision of this kind now existing in the laws of the land.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS] He has referred to the city of Lynn, Massachusetts, as an illustration of his argument. I desire to refer to the same illustration. I am now seeking to bring the case within the rule laid down by the Speaker of the House, that we should look to such information as comes to the House through its usual course of procedure under the law. I therefore use official records; and by these, taking the case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I find that in the city of Lynn the local postage, which is the measure of profit to the Government of the free-delivery system, is $1,499.24, while the cost to the Government is $6,302.95. In other words, there goes into the deficiency an item of $5,000 on account of the free-delivery system in that city. Now I could not use this information, I presume, if it came through some other channel than an official record of the House; but it is here in that form.

Take the illustration of Lawrence, immediately preceding. There the profit to Government from local postage, which is the postage resulting from free delivery, is $1,744.67, while the amount paid out by the Government for this service is $6,960, making a difference of $5,200, which becomes a general charge upon the country. In other words, for the benefit of these two localities the whole country is charged $10,000 for the expense of the free-delivery system there. I submit that under the law, and upon the face of this bill, and from reports that came to the House through its regular forms of procedure, it is shown that in the instances referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts there is an actual reduction here by the abolition of the free delivery, and if the distinguished gentleman will refer to almost any other case of the kind he will find the same result.

The Chair takes official notice of the fact that there is a heavy deficiency; that these estimates call for $8,100,000; and the Chair undoubtedly takes official notice also of the fact that this results in part from the difference between the local revenues of the free-delivery cities and the amount that has to be paid out of the general fund for the purpose of meeting that expense.

Though, if I were occupying the chair, I would not press this rule too far, I think it an admirable rule when applied within the meaning and spirit of its provisions. The present case seems to me to come clearly within its contemplation. The provision is germane, for it has reference to a matter concerning post-office appropriations. It evidently retrenches expenditure, because by the record before the House it is shown that the revenues are but a small sum, while the expenditures are large.

Mr. BANKS. If the House will allow me a moment, I wish to correct an error. In stating the increased cost of the letter-carrier system at $297,000 upon the authority of the Postmaster-General, I understood that to apply to these fifty-five towns; but I am informed that upon the estimate the reduction of expenses for these fifty-five towns will be $180,000, instead of $297,000, as I stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman is still mistaken, if he will excuse the remark. This official statement shows that taking the whole of the fifty-five towns having a less population than 40,000 the difference between the amount received and the amount expended growing out of the system is $103,701.62.

Mr. BANKS. That is a calculation upon which I will not enter, because it is mere speculation. The honorable Chairman of this committee must have a real and absolute proof of specific reduction in expenses which can be computed in figures. No speculation will answer, no assumption and no argument will answer, for that which the decision of the Chairman will do will be this: it will give a privilege to this proposition over any other proposition which can be presented in this bill or as an amendment thereto, because it reduces expenses. Therefore, the reduction must appear either on the face of the proposition or in comparison with other facts established in the laws of the land. It is not a matter for speculation or argument which might affect the judgment of the committee on the merits of the bill, but the decision of the Chair will show this is admitted as privileged above every other, because it reduces expenses.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask whether he is not speculating, too, when he argues that express companies may carry the mails of these persons in cities? And further, whether he is not speculating when he says that the withdrawal of letter-carriers may bring about the necessity of employing more clerks, when the face of the bill provides for a reduction? I ask whether in reference to both propositions it is not a mere matter of speculation on his part?

Mr. BANKS. I am speaking argumentatively on the points he has named, but substantially as a matter of positive and absolute fact when I state the expenses of the offices will be increased more or less upon those matters, and that that is a matter for the House to determine hereafter; that neither the Chair nor any other member of this nor the House itself can by any possibility determine what will be the amount of increase on these several items. The honorable gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations assumes from certain estimates or reports there may be assumed to be a reduction; but the estimates of appropriations and the reports of committees of the House are not absolute matters of fact, but are matters speculative and argumentative; they are propositions not yet clearly established. What the Chair must have before he can rule this proposition is privileged above any other which can be presented to this bill is that it does absolutely reduce expenses of the Government in a manner which can be computed and stated in sums and figures.

I will read again the items I have jotted down, in a single moment when this question was brought to me, as a probable increase of expense the amount of which no man can tell. One is the increased cost of clerical force. That is something which must be supplied if these 25,000 people who are now supplied by letter-carriers are to be sent to their offices. There must be an increase of clerical force, and neither the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, nor you, Mr. Chairman, nor I, can tell what that is. There must be the increased cost of enlarging the present post-office accommodations. We cannot tell what it is. The amount now saved by preventing people resorting to the telegraph, a matter which the Postmaster-General himself refers to, would be less if this change is made. The loss to the Government by the assumption of more or less of this business of carrying letters by express companies now existing, and which the Postmaster-General refers to, must be considered. But we cannot tell what is the probable or possible increase of expenditures under these different heads. We only know they cannot be avoided. In almost every instance the Postmaster-General calls our attention to them. The speculations of reports, of estimates, or reports of committees, or any arguments which may be made by members of the House are not the kind of things necessary to enable the Chair to admit this proposition as a matter of privilege above all other propositions, because there is no clear or positive fact upon which he can base his decision.

Mr. RANDALL. I am at a loss to know how we can ever determine a fact better than we can determine the fact that is presented in this case in controversy, that it is a saving. Here we have an official document from the Postmaster-General in which he states certain expenses of the system of letter-carriers in certain towns. He gives it for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, which is the last fiscal year. Now that shows certain expenditures for that year that has gone past, and is a fact. He shows, furthermore, that in the various towns, fifty-five in number, there was an excess of expenditure over the receipts in those towns of $103,701.62. That is another fact. We establish the fact that by breaking up that system we are enabled to reduce the appropriation. It was last year $1,900,000, and we reduce it to $1,650,000. I want to know how anything can be made clearer than the fact that the effect of this amendment is to reduce expenditures?

Mr. BANKS. One word, if the Chairman will pardon me. I admit the fact the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated. It is a fact, and if it stood alone it would justify his opinion, but there is in addition the absolute certainty a revision of the Post-Office establishment will follow the adoption of that proposition. Therefore that fact which he has stated and this fact which I state, both of them together, bring it exactly within the scope of the decision of the honorable Speaker the other day when he alluded to additional legislation which must be adopted in order to complete this as it is now under the present system. That additional legislation we cannot yet determine. We do not know what it will be. We cannot determine what the cost of it will be; and until we can determine what cost that legislation may involve, under the decision, which is certainly the rule of the committee, made by the honorable Speaker the other day with the unanimous consent of the House—until we know what that is, we cannot assume there is to be an absolute reduction in the expenses as a matter of absolute fact.

Mr. RANDALL. The statement last made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is purely argumentative. The fact stands there nevertheless. But he wants to argue that by the abolishing of certain offices that are now a cost to the Government we might possibly have to employ others at a greater expense.

Mr BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] whether, in case this proviso was stricken out, it would not be necessary to increase the appropriation for letter-carriers?

Mr. RANDALL Of course it would.

Mr. BLAND. Then if in the event of striking out this proviso it will be necessary to increase the appropriation for the letter-carriers, upon the face of the proposition itself it is a proposition of retrenchment. In other words, the bill provides for a certain appropriation to be made for letter-carriers, and if an increased number of letter-carriers is to be provided for if the proviso be stricken out, of course the appropriation must be increased; and hence upon the face of the proposition itself it is in the line of retrenchment, and all this argument is brought in from outside propositions to defeat this proposition of retrenchment. Upon the face of the proviso it is in the line of retrenchment, but gentlemen go outside to bring arguments to show it is not retrenchment. The ruling of the Speaker was, that if the proposition is upon its face in the line of retrenchment it is within the rule. Now, if you strike out this proviso there would be necessitated an increased appropriation, and this shows that the proposition is upon its face within the line of retrenchment. I think there can be no controversy about the matter.

Mr. MUTCHLER. The proposition on which the point of order was raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] abolishing the Indian Bureau in the Interior Department bore upon its face that it needed no appropriation at all. As a matter of course it was a retrenchment of expenditure so far as that Bureau was concerned. Yet the Speaker took into consideration the fact that if the Indian Bureau in the Interior Department was abolished it would necessitate an appropropriation in the War Department and additional legislation. Consequently, he decided that it did not appear upon the face of the bill itself that it retrenched expenditure. Now, it may be true that if this proviso be stricken out of the bill it may necessitate an increase of appropriation for carriers; but it also appears that outside of that it necessitates the establishment of new post-offices, the employment of new postmasters and additional clerks, and reduces the revenue 50 per cent. in every city where the carrier system exists, and that it reduces largely the volume of mail matter.

Mr. BLAND. Does this bill make any appropriation for an increased number of clerks, &c.?

Mr. RANDALL. We do not appropriate in this bill for any such increase.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] says that if this proviso is stricken out we must necessarily increase the appropriations to pay the salaries for letter-carriers. That does not follow at all. The salaries of letter-carriers may be decreased. We may perhaps cut off five hundred of these carriers or a thousand. They receive to-day $1,650,000 by this bill. If we strike out this proviso, that simply reduces the salaries of the carriers now employed. It does not necessitate one cent of additional appropriation. There is nothing here that shows that it would be necessary to make a dollar's additional appropriation. This amount of $1,650,000 is appropriated, for what purpose? To pay letter-carriers. Suppose you increase the number of carriers, you still leave the increased number of carriers to receive, what? Why $1,650,000 and no more.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I deny that this bill does retrench. I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 88, giving the percentage of cost for letter-carrying in different offices. I find in the city of Brooklyn, with four times the population of 40,000 or more, the cost of the letter-carriers is 44 per cent., while in the city of Portland, with a population of 35,000, the expenses are only 11 per cent. Now by this bill Portland, where the expense is 11 per cent., is stricken out, while Brooklyn, where the expenses of letter-carrying are 44 per cent., is retained. If gentlemen can show me any propriety in retaining the system in Brooklyn, with four times a population of 40,000, and where the expense is 44 per cent., and striking out Portland, where it only cost 11 per cent. to carry their letters, I would like to have them do it.

Mr. RANDALL. I will read to the gentleman precisely what the letter-carrying system costs in Portland. The receipts are $3,269.85 and the expenses $8,792.96. It seems to me it would be retrenchment to strike that out.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have before me in this Senate Document a statement showing the amount of receipts and expenditures of various post-offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, wherein it is shown that the expenses for letter-carrying in the city of Portland, with a population of 35,000, are 11 per cent. of the receipts, while in the city of Brooklyn, with five or six times that population, the expenses of the letter-carrying system are 47 per cent. of its receipts.

Mr. RANDALL. The figures I have given are from the statement of the Postmaster-General made within a week.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Enough has been said on this question of order to show that the question itself must turn upon a speculative idea, not to be drawn from the bill itself; in other words, will the proposed clause of the bill retrench expenses? otherwise it is clearly out of order, and it is a duty on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to show that it will retrench expenditures, not to produce an estimate to show that a certain amount may be reduced. This still leaves the whole question of speculation open, because the practical question is how much is the local postal business which the letter-carrier system produces? That question is not touched by the speculative report of the committee, and I wish to add that in an official document bearing directly upon this question the Postmaster-General reports that—

No additions have been made during the year to the number of free-delivery offices. The service was, however, extended in five large cities by discontinuing the smaller offices in and adjacent to them, substituting branch offices, and extending the carriers' delivery, in accordance with the policy announced in my last report.

Is not that retrenchment? It is continuing the smaller offices. Now, let us see whether this proviso is in the line of retrenchment or not. I insist that the committee, in order to overcome that and to show that there is retrenchment in this bill, has got to prove to you, Mr. Chairman, that the local postages will continue at the rate they are now; otherwise there is no retrenchment, and they have to go outside of the bill, entirely outside of any report, and prove that fact, and ask the Chair to hear them, and sustain their theory; and that is precisely within the ruling of the Speaker in the case of the transfer of the Indian Bureau. Let us go a little further. The Postmaster-General says:

The general results of the service make a most gratifying exhibit and clearly indicate its usefulness and popularity. For the first time since its establishment the aggregate postage on local matter exceeded the total expense. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, the deficiency of local postage to meet the expenses was $191,214.75. This year the excess of postage over the expense was $67,517.55. The increase in the cost of the service was 4 per cent; the increase in the postage on local matter was 21 per cent.

And now in the line of retrenchment they propose to wipe out the carrier system in cities which give the Government a revenue of $67,517.55 from the local postage in excess of cost, and they say that is retrenchment. I insist that their argument cannot stand; and in order to sustain themselves they have got to introduce theories which cannot be drawn from the bill.

If I can be allowed to go further, I undertake to say that many of the offices in cities retained in the bill are not those which pay the greatest revenue in proportion to the receipts of the offices, and that many of those that are rejected pay as great or greater revenue to the Government in proportion to the receipts of the office. I therefore insist that on any theory that the committee may adopt this paragraph is not in the line of retrenchment at all, and being new legislation, is not in order.

Mr. MILLS. All the gentlemen who have discussed this question of order in favor of the exception made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] have fallen into this error, that they have departed from the text of the bill and sought the aid of extraneous facts to demonstrate the truth of their logic. This point of order is in the nature of an exception made by an attorney to an instrument calling upon the court for its construction. In the interpretation of an instrument, when exception is made to it, the court cannot resort to extraneous facts to ascertain what that paper means, but must construe it by the evidence on the face of the paper itself.

Now that is a legal proposition that no lawyer will controvert, that when a court is called to construe a paper and decide what it means, and whether it is competent evidence or not, the court must look to the face of the paper and away from all extraneous facts, because if extraneous facts are brought in it then becomes a question for a jury to determine, and not the court. Now, sir, the Chair must look steadily to the language of this proviso to see whether it comes within the exception of the rule, and affirmatively establish the fact that it does retrench expenditures. Looking to that fact it is as clear as demonstration can be, because it does not admit of proof that three times three make nine, or that twice two make four, or that the lesser is embraced in the greater; these are facts the statement of which carries conviction. It is not necessary to prove that forty embraces two twenties, or four tens, or eight fives. Then, if this service is to be confined to cities of 40,000 inhabitants, it shows necessarily that it retrenches expenditures, because it cuts off from the carrier system all cities having a less population than forty thousand. It seems to me that the proposition is clear, and upon its face the provision establishes the conclusive fact that it does retrench expenditures.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When this question was before the House when we were in Committee of the Whole on the legislative, executive, &c., bill, we had a debate against the rule itself, and against the paragraph proposed to be considered under it, as we have had to-day. Whoever has listened to gentlemen speaking about this paragraph can gather very clearly the effect of the paragraph itself. Now, in considering whether this comes under the rule, we must inquire whether it cuts off expenditures, and not whether under some other law additional pay may be given to postmasters in certain cities; whether we will by some provision of law re-enact the expenditure which is cut off by this bill.

I always regarded the adoption of the rule in its present form as being unfortunate, but I do not hesitate a moment to say that this proviso is in conformity with the spirit and letter of that rule, is relevant, and should be admitted.

There is another thing that I desire to call your attention to, sir. You will find that under parliamentary law where there is a doubt as to the relevancy of a proposition, whether it is germane, the deliberative body in which it is offered always has the benefit of the doubt, and in that case it is left to a majority to decide whether it shall be admitted or not. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that you might rule twenty times on propositions in a manner which I might consider entirely wrong and I would not undertake to appeal from the decision of the Chair unless very grave public interests were at stake.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not undertake to address this committee with any assumption of a superior knowledge of the rules of this House. But I am clearly of the opinion that unless some restriction is put upon the Committee on Appropriations we might as well dispense entirely with all the other committees of this House. The proposition which is now the subject of discussion under the point of order to my understanding clearly presents two questions or considerations: the one relates to the force to be employed, the machinery to be used in carrying out the postal system of the country; the other relates to the pay and the support of that force. It strikes me that it would be proper for the Committee on Appropriations to determine what provision shall be made for the support of that force. It is equally proper that the Committee on the Post-Office Department should recommend to this House such legislation as may be necessary to provide the instrumentalities, the force, the machinery for carrying on the Post-Office Department. And it is a separate duty for the Committee of Ways and Means to provide the ways and means by which they are to be paid. In that way the several duties are divided and apportioned to the several committees to which those duties properly belong, and there is no confusion, no aggression by one committee on the province of another.

I think that the point of order is well taken, because, while it may be true that this proviso, if enacted into law, would lead to a reduction of the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, it does not necessarily follow that such would be the case. If you reduce the number of carriers, the appropriation in the bill for that purpose remains the same as before, and it might be that the Postmaster-General, in a liberal construction of the law in behalf of the interest of his own service, might distribute the same sum of money among the reduced force provided to carry out the practical working of his Department.

I do not understand that the amount is reduced; but, whether it is or not, the same criticism would apply. It is the province of the Committee on the Post-Office Department to provide the machinery for the carrying on of that Department, to recommend such legislation as may be necessary to provide the instrumentalities and the agencies for carrying on the work of that very important branch of the Government. It is the part of the Committee of Ways and Means to devise the manner in which the revenues shall be raised to defray the expenses of that Department; and it is the province of the Committee on Appropriations to say how much of those revenues shall be devoted to that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] I will state a fact which will at once dismiss altogether his charge of the assumption of power on the part of the Committee on Appropriations. I find in the appropriation bill of year before last the legislation upon which we now propose to retrench. Of course it is quite proper and quite in the line of the desire of the people of this country that this retrenchment should be made. We have not assumed anything; we have only taken the liberty of retrenching in the exact manner in which this excessive expenditure was placed upon the country.

Mr. LANE. I would inquire if this discussion is in order and how long it is to continue?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hearing gentlemen upon the question of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this debate under the control of the Chair as to the length of time it may occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. When members desire to address arguments to the Chair for the purpose of influencing his decision of any question, the Chair would have great delicacy in refusing to hear any gentleman upon that subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In response to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I desire simply to say that I have no doubt that he can find precedents enough to sustain the present action of his committee, and I do not mean to impute any intentional wrong to that committee, by any means.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that. I want to run right through all these bills.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would remind the gentleman that a new rule has been adopted for the guidance of this House since the precedent was set to which he refers; and it strikes me that probably the establishment of that precedent led to the adoption of the new rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Very likely; and we are only running in the line of that rule, which allows us to retrench. Now, if the execution of that rule is to be prevented by these points of order, we will be saying that Congress possesses the power to incorporate in an appropriation bill anything that may increase expenditures, but Congress is impotent to incorporate in that appropriation bill anything to retrench expenditures.

Mr. FORT. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let us have this point of order decided.

Mr. FORT. Let the Chairman have until Monday to reflect upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will not now rise.

Mr. FORT. It is now nearly five o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the Chair decide this point of order.

Mr. FORT. If the Chair wants to decide it now——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point.

Mr. MUTCHLER. Let the decision of the Chair be given, and let us go on and finish this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. FORT. If the Chair is ready to decide the point of order, I will withdraw my motion that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] has raised the point of order that the clause of the bill now under consideration is in contravention of Rule 120 of the House as amended at this session and as construed by the honorable Speaker of this House on the 28th ultimo on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] in reference to the provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill transferring the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

Rule 120, as amended by this House January 17, is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; [nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.*]

The clause of the bill now under consideration, and which it is claimed contravenes this rule, is as follows:

For payment to letter-carriers, $1,650,000.: Provided, That hereafter the free-delivery system shall not be established in cities of less than forty thousand inhabitants, and may be continued only in cities of not less than forty thousand inhabitants where now established by law.

That this clause changes the existing law is admitted. That it is germane to the subject-matter of the bill is not questioned. The point of order raised by the honorable gentleman is that the proviso to the pending paragraph does not, upon its face, retrench expenditures, and being a change of existing law, it is not in order to incorporate it in this general appropriation bill.

In view of the local effects of the provision now in question, the present occupant of the chair is not free from embarrassment, as the city in which he resides is affected by that part of the bill upon which the point of order is raised. The Chair trusts, however, that he will be able to divest himself of all personal considerations in deciding a question of so much importance to the people of a large number of the cities of this country, and which involves an expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars; the amount appropriated by the clause in question is $1,650,000, and the amount appropriated for the same service for the current year was $2,000,000.

The decision made by the honorable Speaker of the House on the 28th ultimo has been referred to; and if this case were similar to that decided by the Speaker, the Chair would have no doubt whatever as to the course to be pursued. A portion of that decision has already been read by the Clerk at the request of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MUTCHLER.] The Chair, however, desires to call the attention of the committee to another portion of that decision which has not been quoted. It is found upon page 17 of the RECORD of April 29. The Speaker said:

The inquiry then recurs, is this amendment such a one as by its own force and the other provisions of this bill retrenches expenditures? Does that appear? The Chair might answer, that to abolish an office is the retrenchment of expenditure; and if such abolition were begun and perfected by this bill, the Chair would have no hesitation in holding that such an abolition did accomplish a retrenchment of expenditure.

In the case of the Indian transfer bill, it did not appear that there was an absolute abolishment of offices, but simply a transfer of certain duties from one set of officers to another. But in this case it appears that there is an absolute discontinuance of certain officials or employés of the Government; and it seems indisputable to the Chair that the abolition of an office or the discontinuance of a particular service is prima facie a retrenchment of expenditures. The provision of the bill in question discontinues the free delivery system in all cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants, where it has heretofore been established by law. The Chair will take official cognizance of the fact that the appropriation for the same service was, for the current year, $2,000,000, while the clause in question appropriates but $1,650,000. The difference of $350,000 is accounted for in the large decrease of the employés of the Government caused by the discontinuance of the free delivery system in cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants. Hence it seems quite clear to the Chair that this provision does retrench expenditures. Therefore, as to the merits of the point raised, the Chair would be inclined to hold that this question does not come within the rule laid down in the decision of the honorable Speaker in the case referred to, in which decision the Speaker ruled the objectionable section out of the bill.

But upon another ground the Chair would hold that the point of order is not well taken. Upon page 75 of the Digest a ruling is reported as follows:

In the case of an appropriation reported by the Committee on Appropriations in conflict with the one hundred and twentieth rule, and committed with the bill, it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole to rule it out of order, because the House having committed the bill (of course it is otherwise where the point was reserved before commitment) are presumed to have received, as in order, the report in its entirety.

The Chair finds this ruling in the Digest, and presumes that it represents the course of proceeding heretofore in this House. For this reason, as well as that already stated by the Chair, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. BANKS. I would inquire whether all points of order regarding this bill were not reserved?

Mr. RUSK. They were.

Mr. HALE. They were reserved upon my suggestion. I made the point when the gentleman from Indiana reported the bill.

Mr. BANKS. Certainly the House reserved this question of order, and submitted it to the Committee of the Whole for decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware that all points of order had been reserved on this bill prior to its commitment, but he has already decided the question both upon the merits and upon the technical point also. All points of order having been reserved, the decision of the Chair will stand upon the merits of the question raised by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvana, [Mr. MUTCHLER,] and for the reasons stated the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the whole of the proviso.

Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to see why the Committee on Appropriations should propose to discontinue the carrier system in cities of less than forty thousand population and to continue it in cities having a population of more than forty thousand. I sent to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of ascertaining precisely what amount of money would be required to continue the system in cities of less than forty thousand, over and above the local postage; and I find that the amount is just $180,000. The amount required to continue the system in cities of more than forty thousand population, exclusive of the city of New York, is $391,000. It will therefore be seen that in fifty-five cities and towns, in which the free-delivery system is proposed to be abolished by this bill, it would require only $180,000 to continue it, over and above the amount realized from local postage; whereas in thirty-one cities in which the system is to be coninued (exclusive of New York) the enormous sum of $391,000 is required to meet the expense. Now, if the committee are desirous of retrenching expenditures, and saving money for the people, why not discontinue the system in these thirty-one cities where it costs $391,000, and continue it in the fifty-five cities where the expense is only $180,000?

The people of all our cities and towns where the free-carrier system has been introduced are strongly attached to it; and if this bill passes in its present form, the Committee on Appropriations will ascertain that this time they have punched the heads of the people, not of the office-holders. This system is intended for the benefit of the laboring-man, the man who goes to his employment at seven o'clock in the morning and does not return until six in the evening; the man who does not have the time or opportunity to walk half a mile or a mile to the post-office every day. It is for such men that this system should be designed rather than for the merchant who has his clerks and other employés whom he can send to the post-office whenever it is necessary.

I say, then, by discontinuing this free-carrier system in fifty-five towns of the country we would not only do a foolish thing, but one which the people would not approve.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether a man living in a city who has only half a mile to travel to the post-office is put to any more trouble than a man who rides ten miles in the country to get his mail?

Mr. MUTCHLER. The people throughout the country do have the free-delivery system, because the mails are carried as closely to their doors as it is practicable to have them carried, and this is done at the expense of the Government.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope not.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to rise is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is desirable to go through with the bill before a recess is taken. If the House remain a quarter of an hour I will not object, although I would greatly prefer to have it remain in session half an hour. It has been suggested that we have a night session to dispose of this paragraph.

Mr. RUSK. Let us vote.

Mr. CUTLER. I submit an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out all of the section after the word "inhabitants," in line 39.

Mr. CLYMER. It is evident the amendment and the amendment to the amendment will lead to discussion. They involve matters of great interest to gentlemen upon the floor, more than any other in the bill. I do not know that I care to discuss it myself, but I know others who do, and in order to permit that full discussion to which its importance entitles it, I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were ayes 91, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Hunger is irresistible, and I do not ask for any further count.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. HARRISON, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

*The part of the rule in brackets is the amendment of January 17, 1876.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there are no further bills to be introduced by members who were not in their seats when their States were called, the Chair will now lay before the House sundry executive communications.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order. It is that the second call of the States must be proceeded with now until the expiration of the morning hour, which will be at a quarter past one o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, but will, with the consent of the House, lay these executive communications before the House.

Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent that the communication of the governor, with the accompanying memorial of the State Legislature, be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter and memorial are as follows:

STATE OF WISCONSIN, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Madison, May 3, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of memorial to Congress, No. 13, of the Legislature of this State, relative to the right of GEORGE W. CATE to occupy a seat as a member of Congress for the eighth district of Wisconsin, and I have to request that you will lay it before the House of Representatives of the United States of America for consideration at as early a day as practicable.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HARRISON LUDINGTON,
Governor of Wisconsin.

Hon. MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Memorial to Congress, No. 13, requesting an investigation to be made into the right of GEORGE W. CATE to occupy a seat as a member of Congress for the eighth district of Wisconsin.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, respectfully represent:

That at the general election held in the eighth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin on Tuesday, the 3d day of November, 1874, for Representative in Congress, the whole number of votes cast for such Representative was as follows: Alex. S. McDill received 9,540 votes, GEORGE W. CATE received 9,502 votes, giving Mr. McDill a majority of 38 votes. By refusal of the county board of canvassers of Wood County to canvass the votes cast in the first ward of the city of Grand Rapids and the town of Lincoln on some alleged slight irregularity in the making of the returns from these precincts 96 votes cast for Mr. McDill and 56 votes cast for Mr. CATE were not included in the canvass made for said county of Wood, and the return of votes cast in that county to the State board of canvassers was fraudulently made as being 655 for GEORGE W. CATE and 457 for A. S. McDill, whereas the vote was in fact 711 for MR. CATE and 553 for Mr. McDill.

The supreme court of the State of Wisconsin, on motion, granted an alternative writ of mandamus directed to the State board of canvassers and the secretary of state, commanding said board to determine upon the election returns from the several counties in the eighth congressional district. The case was argued before the court on the 5th day of December, and the court held that it "could not go behind the returns and correct frauds and mistakes, and adjudge which of the candidates was elected," but could only determine whether the State board of canvassers ought to include in its canvass and statement of the votes cast for Representative in Congress those returned from Wood County, (which were incomplete as above recited.) The court said: "We cannot determine the right to the office but only the duty of the State board of canvassers in respect to the canvass. The power to determine the right is, by the Constitution of the United States, vested exclusively in the House of Representatives. (36 Wisconsin, page 505.")

The court added:

"There is nothing in the statement of the board of county canvassers showing or tending to show, neither was it claimed on the argument of demurrer, that any effort was made to procure corrected returns from the rejected town and ward. On the contrary, the silence of their statement on that subject, the suppression of the nature of the alleged defects in such returns, for which they were rejected, and the fact that it does not appear that the board availed itself of the power given by law to adjourn for the purpose of procuring corrected returns, leaves upon our minds a most painful impression that the county canvassers utterly neglected their duty in this respect, and illegally and wantonly disfranchised all of the electors who voted at such election in the rejected town and ward. If they did so, they committed a most serious offense, an offense which strikes at the very foundation of our system of government, and which cannot be too severely censured. Hence it was that we felt justified in saying during the argument of the demurrer, that he who, by fraud or by willful disregard of his sworn duty, defeats the will of the people as expressed by their votes commits a political crime next to treason and nearly akin to it, and that this court will never fail, on any proper occasion, to characterize such offense in fitting terms.

* * * * * * *

"The State canvassers were powerless in the premises. They can only act upon the certified statements of the county canvassers returned by the several county clerks to the secretary of state, and have no authority to procure corrected returns or to go behind the returns thus made" (Revised Statutes, chapter 7, section 80.)

The official canvass for said district was therefore made without including the votes cast in the town of Lincoln and the first ward in the city of Grand Rapids and was officially declared to be as follows:

GEORGE W. CATE received..... 9,446 votes,
Alex. S. McDill received..... 9,444 votes, giving MR. CATE an apparent majority of 2 votes.

Your memorialists further represent, that by the rejection of the votes cast in the town of Lincoln and the first ward of the city of Grand Rapids the election of one C. O. Baker, as county clerk, was shown, whereas he was in fact defeated if the votes from these precincts had been received, and that said Baker was the principal canvassing officer. The case was brought before the supreme court of this State at its last term, and after an exhaustive examination of all the facts connected with the rejection of the returns above named by the county canvassers, the court unanimously decided that the canvassers had transgressed their authority in so rejecting the returns.

They characterized the action as "a most indecent and flagrant violation of duty, too palpable for blunder, too corrupt for any mercy of construction."

The court then pronounced judgment of ouster against Baker, and emphasized the judgment by imposing a fine of $200 on him.

That your honorable body may better understand what was decided, the language of the court is here employed:

"4. There is nothing to distinguish the case of Kromer from ordinary cases of the kind. Judgment will therefore go in his case in the usual form against him and in favor of the relator.

"But the case of Baker is very distinguishable from ordinary cases of contest for office. At the time of the election and canvass he was county clerk; one of the officials who made the register of votes in the first ward of Grand Rapids, which he now asks to operate so as to disfranchise at the election all the voters in that ward. The county canvass was made by him and the two officials whom he took to his assistance to form the board of county canvassers. Saving the defendant's personal knowledge of the register in the first ward of Grand Rapids it does not appear that the board of county canvassers had any notice of the irregularities or defects in the register of voters in these five wards now urged for the defendant. Certain it is that they did not, in the canvass, reject the votes in any of them for any irregularities or defects of the registers. The defense which the defendant now sets up for his usurpation of office appears to have been an after-thought, which cannot mitigate his breach of duty then. The board of county canvassers did reject the returns from the town of Lincoln and the first ward of Grand Rapids for alleged illegality and defectiveness, not in the election, but in the returns themselves not now relied on by the defendant. The rejection of these returns, wholly unauthorized, gave excuse to the defendant and his associates in the board of canvassers to declare the defendant himself elected county clerk. This was a most indecent and flagrant violation of duty; too palpable for blunder, too corrupt for any mercy of construction. If the returns from the town and ward were so informal and incomplete—in the language of the board of canvassers, so illegal and defective—that the board could not canvass them, it was the duty of the defendant and his associates to dispatch a messenger for corrected returns. (Taylor's Statutes, chapter 7 of section 89. State vs. Pierpont, 29 Wisconsin, page 108; State vs. Board State Canvassers, supra.) A county clerk cannot be tolerated in so tampering with his statutory duty; in so baffling the constitutionally expressed will of the voters of his county, to keep himself in office to which another is elected, by violation of his official oath and duty.

"Speaking of this very canvass, it was said in State vs. Board of State Canvassers, supra: 'There is nothing in the statement of this board of county canvassers showing or tending to show, neither was it claimed on the argument of the demurrer, that any effort was made to procure corrected returns from the rejected town or ward. On the contrary, the silence of their statement on that subject, the suppression of the nature of the alleged defects in such returns for which they were rejected, and the fact that it does not appear that the board availed itself of the power given by law to adjourn for the purpose of procuring corrected returns, leave upon our mind a most painful impression that the county canvassers utterly neglected their duty in this respect, and illegally and wantonly disfranchised all the voters who voted at such election in the rejected town and ward. If they did so, they committed a most serious offense; an offense which strikes at the very foundations of our system of government, and which cannot be too severely censured. Thus it was, that we felt justified in saying, during the argument of the demurrer, that he who by fraud or by willful disregard of his sworn duty defeats the will of the people as expressed by their votes, commits a political crime next to treason and nearly akin to it; and that this court will never fail, on any proper occasion, to characterize such an offense in fitting terms.'

"The shameful truth suggested in that case is apparent in this. Then we could only censure; now we can punish. Section 16 of chapter 169, Revised Statutes, under which this proceeding is taken, contains the ancient and salutary power of imposing a fine on the usurping officer in such cases to the extent of $2,000. Such a statute in such cases as this should not be a dead letter. If any defendant in any case of quo warranto can earn such fine, this defendant has earned it in this. It is our duty, now about to be fulfilled to oust him from an office which he has usurped for one-third of the official term by willful malfeasance in office, corrupt in fact as in law. And we should feel this court to be in some sort his particeps criminis if in doing so we should refuse to exercise the power to punish him with which the law intrusts us. Our only doubt on this point has been the proper amount of the fine to be imposed. This is, so far as we are advised, the first instance of a fine imposed under this statute. And we have been led to think that a fine moderate in amount will be sufficient for the punishment of this defendant and for example in such cases. If the example should prove insufficient, the precedent will not stand in the way of heavier fines in future cases of the kind. The same judgment will therefore go in the case of Baker as in the case of Kromer, with the addition of a fine against the former of $200."

It will thus appear to your honorable body that the vote rejected in the county canvass of Wood County should have been included with the other votes cast for member of Congress. Adding them to their proper columns, it appears that the number of votes cast in the eighth congressional district of Wisconsin for member of Congress on the 3d day of November, 1874, was as follows:

Alex. S. McDill received..... 9,540
GEORGE W. CATE received..... 9,502

showing that Mr. McDill received a majority of the votes cast for member of Congress, but Mr. CATE received a certificate of election through the perpetration of an act which, unless the chief justice of the State of Wisconsin was in error in his judgment and conclusions, was "a most indecent and flagrant violation of duty; too palpable for blunder; too corrupt for any mercy of construction."

Your memorialists further represent that Hon. A. S. McDill, who received a majority of the votes cast for member of Congress for the eighth district of Wisconsin, died in November last.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully pray your honorable body that you will direct the proper committee to inquire why the votes cast in said town of Lincoln and the first ward of the city of Grand Rapids should not be counted; and if, upon such inquiry and investigation, it be determined that such votes ought to be received and counted, then that such committee be instructed to report to the House by what right Hon. GEORGE W. CATE holds a seat in your body and assumes to act as congressman for the eighth congressional district of Wisconsin.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to send a copy of this memorial to each of our Representatives in Congress and one to each member of the Committee of Privileges and Elections.

R. L. D. POTTER,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
SAM. S. FIFIELD,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Approved March 9, 1876.

HARRISON LUDINGTON, Governor.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Madison, Wisconsin:

I, Peter Doyle, secretary of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the annexed and foregoing pages are a true, complete, and full copy of memorial to Congress No. 13, requesting an investigation to be made into the right of GEORGE W. CATE to occupy a seat as member of Congress for the eighth district of Wisconsin, passed by the Wisconsin Legislature at its annual session, 1876, and approved March 9, 1876, and now on file in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the city of Madison, this 3d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1876.

[SEAL.]

PETER DOYLE,
Secretary of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHAPIN. I ask unanimous consent to make a report at this time from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HALE. For what purpose?

Mr. CHAPIN. For consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I have called for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. HALE. I have called for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I think the gentleman will withdraw his point when he hears the resolution.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman can offer it on the next call, which will now proceed under the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the next call is for resolutions, "at which time bills on leave may be introduced; and all resolutions which give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion; so also in regard to bills introduced at this time and giving rise to debate." The call begins with the State of Maine.

PUBLIC SESSIONS OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following resolution, and upon it ask the previous question:

Resolved, That the several committees of this House charged with investigations be, and are hereby, directed to conduct such investigations with open doors while any testimony is being taken.

Mr. MORRISON. This is the same resolution which was voted on the other day.

Mr. HALE. But it does not require a two-thirds vote on this call. Gentlemen on the other side can vote it down if they choose.

The question being taken on seconding the call for the previous question, there were—ayes 60, noes 89.

Mr. HALE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 91.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules to authorize the Committee on Banking and Currency to report at any time touching the questions relating to silver currency.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. The morning hour not having expired, I submit that the gentleman cannot make that motion until it does expire——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. HALE. And he not having——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not desire to hear argument upon the point; the point of order is sustained.

Mr. HALE. But I had not got through the proposition I rose to submit. No gentleman having risen to debate the resolution, which would have carried it over, I move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had taken the floor on another proposition; but the Chair has ruled that his motion was not in order under this call.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not suppose anybody would object to allowing the Committee on Banking and Currency to report at any time touching that question.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the proposition when it comes up in due time; but, until this matter is disposed of, I object to anything else coming up. I move to refer my resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report.

Mr. CLYMER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. This call is for a specific purpose. If the House refuses to second the demand for the previous question on a resolution and any gentleman desires to discuss it, it goes over for a day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would have recognized anybody who rose for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise for the purpose.

Mr. HALE. That is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman rose for that purpose, the Chair thinks, after the other proposition was made.

Mr. RANDALL. I maintain that you must go on with the call of the States.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly the call of States must go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first call of States was proceeded with and the States and Territories had all been called. Then the Chair was proceeding with the second call, and this resolution came up under that call. It can be disposed of in several ways. If any gentleman had risen at the proper time to discuss it it would have gone over.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rose for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman so announce; but, if he says he made the announcement, the Chair will take his word for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not sure that I did; I will let the reporters' notes settle the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the reporters that the gentleman did not so announce.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think I did announce it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to referring the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report?

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a division of the question, so that the vote on the instructions may be taken separately.

Mr. HALE. This is not a divisible question.

Mr. RANDALL. The reference is one motion, which would stand alone; the reference with instructions is another proposition.

Mr. BLAINE. But you have a right to combine them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question on the two propositions will be taken separately.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand the Chair to rule this motion cannot be divided?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands from the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BLAINE] it is not divisible.

Mr. HALE. It has never been disputed to my recollection, that this motion must be voted on as an entirety. My motion is to refer it to that committee, with instructions to report the resolution back to the House at once. I never heard any question raised heretofore that such a motion was divisible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman's colleague, who is familiar with the rules, to declare it as his opinion that the motion was divisible.

Mr. HALE. What colleague?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's colleague on my right, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. HALE. I do not understand my colleague to hold any such opinion, but, on the contrary, that such a motion is in order, and is not divisible. I understood my colleague to say that I had a right to combine the motions.

Mr. RANDALL. This resolution has already been debated, and must go over.

Mr. BLAINE. Only the question of order has been debated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to rule discreetly on this question after full hearing.

Mr. HURLBUT. I read from the rules:

A division is not in order on the motion to commit with instructions or on the different branches of instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would seem conclusive. The question, then, recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, that the resolution be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report back at once.

Mr. HALE. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I do not think the Chair understood the point of order I intended to make before, and I do not believe it was ruled on. It is this: This call was for the introduction of bills and resolutions, and debate arising they were to go over. Debate now having taken place on this resolution, under the rule it must go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point has already been ruled upon. The debate or discussion has not touched the merits.

Mr. BLAINE. Only the point of order was discussed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 101, nays 111, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, Banks, Blaine, Blair, Bradford, William R. Brown, Horatio C. On motion of Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I yield to the gentleman if it is to give rise to no debate.

Mr. SAYLER. I think what I propose will meet with no objection. I offer on behalf of a committee of the American Metrological Society two memorials, and I desire to state in this connection that at the last session of Congress similar memorials were offered, signed by several hundred citizens, embracing among them very large numbers of the leading merchants, bankers, and professional men of New York, Boston, and other large cities of the United States, and also many men of science and letters as well as others prominent in public life.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial of Thomas R. Pynchon, president of Trinity College, Connecticut; Professor H. A. Newton, of Yale College; E. B. Elliott, of the Bureau of Statistics; Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles, of New York; and Dr. F. A. R. Barnard, president Columbia College, New York, committee of the American Metrological Society, praying for the adoption of a uniform system of weights, measures, and moneys to be employed by all nations.

Memorial of Thomas R. Pynchon, president of Trinity College, Connecticut; Professor H. A. Newton, of Yale College; E. B. Elliott, of the Bureau of Statistics; and Dr. F. A. R. Barnard, president Columbia College, New York, committee of the American Metrological Society, praying that the coinage of gold and silver may be made in strict accordance with the denominations of the metric system.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. SAYLER. In the same connection I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government be, and they are hereby, requested to report to this House, at as early a date as practicable, what objections, if any, there are to making obligatory in all governmental transactions the metrical system of weights and measures, whose use has been authorized in the United States by act of Congress; and also how long a preliminary notice should be given before such obligatory use can be introduced without detriment to the public service; and that they are also requested to state what objections there are, if any, to making the metrical system obligatory in all transactions between individuals, and what is the earliest date that can be set for the obligatory use of the metrical system throughout the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. I object. I desire to confer with the gentleman on the subject.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. PAYNE. By direction of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service I report the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to make a thorough investigation into the management and direction of the custom-house at the port of New York, and as to the changes and reforms necessary to more effectually enforce the laws for the collection of customs revenue, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not make the resolution apply to all the custom-houses?

Mr. PAYNE. One committee could not go around them all.

Mr. RANDALL. One committee can go around some distance. I suggest that it be made to apply to all custom-houses.

Mr. HOSKINS. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The resolution was again read.

The resolution was adopted.

SUFFERERS FROM OVERFLOW IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill which I send to the desk be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] yield for a motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Then I ask that by unanimous consent the bill be considered now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue 500,000 rations, or so much thereof as he may find necessary, to the sufferers from the late overflow in the State of Mississippi; said rations to be distributed under the charge of an officer or officers of the Army, to be detailed for that purpose; and a full and detailed report to be made to Congress of the distribution herein authorized.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and others objected.

Mr. DE BOLT. We have had enough of that kind of distribution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

OPENING OF THE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the officers and employés of the House who may desire to do so to attend the opening of the centennial exhibition, the several offices of the House be closed during the recess from the 9th to the 12th instant, provided that the opening and distribution of the mails shall not be interfered with.

Mr. DANFORD. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to carry into effect the Hawaiian treaty, so that it may be brought before the House for final disposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is put upon that motion, I would have to submit to the House in the interest of the post-office appropriation bill a question as to the present consideration of this measure, unless it could be understood that there should be some limit to the time that will be consumed over it. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from New York how much time is likely to be occupied in finishing up that bill?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I have no wish of course to interfere with the bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations, but I do feel as if I had some claim to the consideration of the House in reference to this particular measure, which has been pending now for three or four months. As I understand there are but two gentlemen who desire to speak upon it, and after they have spoken I propose to demand the previous question and to occupy the hour to which I shall then be entitled as I may deem best; after which we will prepare to take the judgment of the House by a vote of yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will say that the measure of which he has charge will only occupy three hours from the time the House resumes its consideration, I will have to yield the point. Otherwise I would have to call upon the House to determine whether an appropriation bill should be postponed at all for the consideration of any other general matter of legislation. The House must see that appropriation bills are very far behind for this stage of the session, and their early passage by the House is a matter of high public necessity. But if the time for the consideration of the Hawaiian treaty can be limited to three hours, I will feel justified in giving way to it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. So far as I have any control over the debate it will not occupy more than three hours, unless the House should unanimously extend the time of the gentlemen who shall speak. If the House shall do so, of course I cannot control the length of time which the debate will occupy; otherwise I guarantee that there shall not be but three hours' debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this measure be limited to three hours.

Mr. MORRISON. I object. Three hours were occupied on the other side by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] alone.

The motion of Mr. WOOD, of New York, was agreed to.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion having been agreed to, the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union is discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, and it is before the House for consideration.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. When the bill was last under consideration in Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] had the floor and is entitled to it.

Mr. TUCKER. It was agreed the other day, as I understand, with the chairman of the committee that my friend from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] should take the floor this morning and that I should follow him.

[Mr. THOMAS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair.) That can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. SPARKS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BELL. I renew it.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, the House refused to limit the time for debate this morning.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will have additional time if we can possibly reach the question upon this measure before the adjournment to-day. If that can be done I hope every gentleman who speaks can have his time extended. I do not object.

Mr. KELLEY. It is the first time the gentleman from Maryland has raised his voice in this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can make but one decision; objection is made to the extension of time, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means I formed very early an impression that this treaty should not be confirmed by the action of this House. Subsequent reflection has only deepened that impression into a conviction that it is against the true policy of the Government.

But for the elaborate argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] I should not have thought it necessary at all to go into the question of constitutional powers, which has been so fully and ably presented by my friend from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS;] and yet I will venture to say a few words upon this interesting subject in the limited time allotted me.

I apprehend that the delegation of the treaty-making power is no more absolute in its terms than is that of the legislative power. The first clause of the Federal Constitution is that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States," &c. Among those legislative powers we have the powers to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c.; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; the power to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a Navy, and so on. Now the question which is presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts is this: Whether it is competent for the treaty-making power so to tie up the hands of this legislative branch of the Government, as that whatever is determined by it in respect to any of these functions of the legislative department, the Congress of the United States is not only left without option, but is bound to register the edict. Now, sir, the treaty-making power, as I have said, is no more absolute than the legislative power; and I will show you in a moment that it is less so. There are two classes of treaties; treaties that are self-operating, and treaties that require legislative action in order to their operation; and General Washington's objection, which has been referred to, to the action of Congress in 1796 was based on what he stated had occurred in the convention. I have looked up what occurred in the convention, as recorded by Mr. Madison, (3 Madison papers, 1412 et seq.,) and I find that there was a distinction taken in debate between the class of treaties which operate proprio vigore, and that class which requires legislative action to give them effect. Now it is true, as General Washington said in his message, that there was an objection to and a voting down of a general proposition, giving to Congress the power to ratify all treaties; but the distinction was made between those which required legislation and those which did not require it; that is to say, that there are cases in which the treaty-making power is not complete, and its action is only inchoate, and can only be consummated by an act of Congress carrying it into effect. Take for instance the matter provided for here, the provision that we shall not hereafter lay duties on articles imported from Hawaii; though such duties are by existing law now imposed upon these articles. Does the treaty operate to repeal without congressional action, all such existing duties; and by anticipation make nugatory any future act of Congress imposing such duties?

If such be the effect of this treaty, it denudes Congress, it divests Congress of a power given to it by the Constitution. Has the treaty-making power the right to take away a function of the Congress of the United States? Has the treaty-making power of the United States the right by compact with a foreign nation to divest us of our vested power; to say that when the necessities of the Government require that we shall lay a duty on sugar imported from Hawaii we are bound hand and foot to that little country not to do that which Congress has the power to do under the Constitution?

Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] maintain that the treaty-making power may make treaties with each and all the nations of the earth to the effect that hereafter we will never impose any duty upon any article imported from any one of those countries? If so, then what becomes of the power of Congress to lay and collect duties and taxes? By the Constitution we are here charged with important duties, which can only be performed by the exercise of this power to raise revenue; and of that power it is said we can be divested by the action of an alien country through the consent of the treaty-making power.

Upon this question I beg leave to say a few words only. The clause to which my friend from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] has referred (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8) is clear upon this point; that wherever there is anything to be done in order to make operative any action by the Government of the United States, or by any other department of the Government except the legislative department, in all such cases Congress has power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry those powers into effect which the Constitution has thus vested in the Government of the United States, or in any other department or officer thereof. Therefore, if the treaty-making power comes to us and declares "we have made a treaty and we want you to do something to make it effectual," then it follows that the treaty-making power has done an ineffectual thing, has done a thing which is only inchoate, because the Constitution has vested Congress with the exclusive power of doing that which is necessary to make the treaty operative.

I apprehend, therefore, that it is an organic principle of our Government that any treaty which cannot be carried into effect without legislation is not a treaty at all until the necessary legislation is passed. It is a principle of construction with which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is not at all unacquainted, that where there are two provisions of an instrument, whatever that instrument may be, which seem to be repugnant, you must construe them together, and make each and both stand, rather than make either overrule the operation of the other. Therefore it is that where legislation is necessary in order to the operation of a treaty, the treaty is not a treaty at all until the legislation is passed.

Upon this point cases in the books are very confirmatory of my views, and I call attention to them.

In Foster vs. Neilson, 2 Peters, 314, Marshall, C. J., says:

> A treaty is, in its nature, a contract between two nations, not a legislative act, and does not generally effect of itself the object to be accomplished, but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument. In the United States the Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself, without any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.

In Turner vs. The American Baptist Union, 5 McLean's Circuit Court Reports, 344, (decided in 1852,) Mr. Justice McLean said:

> A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This unquestionably applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be the supreme law of the land where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the Constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of the Government can be regarded as a law until it shall have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law as that a treaty which engages to pay a sum of money is in itself a law.
> And in such a case the representatives of the people and States exercise their own judgments in granting or withholding the money. They act upon their own responsibility, and not upon the responsibility of the treaty-making power. It cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign government may be presumed to know that, so far as the treaty stipulates to pay money, the legislative sanction is required.

In Taylor vs. Morton, 2 Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, 454, decided in 1855, Curtis, J., said, after quoting the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution, as to the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, (and remark in passing it does not say by the President and Senate, but under the authority of the United States; that is, with the sanction of that law which is necessary and proper to carry the treaty into effect:)

> There is nothing in the language of this clause which enables us to say that in the case supposed the treaty, and not the act of Congress, is to afford the rule. * * * This provision of our Constitution has made treaties part of our municipal law. But it has not assigned to them any particular degree of authority in our municipal law, nor declared whether laws so enacted shall or shall not be paramount to laws otherwise enacted.

And after holding that a treaty and its obligatory force as between the United States and the foreign nation is a question for the political and not the judicial department, he says:

> There is nothing in the mere fact that a treaty is a law which would prevent Congress from repealing it.

And again—

> To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons which approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of the nation is a matter of the utmost gravity and delicacy; but the power to do so is prerogative, of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power in any case I do not believe. That it must reside somewhere, and be applicable to all cases, I am convinced. I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress.

The decision was, that a law of Congress could repeal a treaty.

And finally, in the Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wallace, 616, (decided in 1870,) Swayne, Justice, speaking for the Supreme Court, and citing the case of Taylor vs. Morton, already quoted with approval, said:

> A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress, and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty.

And this principle was decided in that case.

It thus appears that the judicial department may hold that a treaty stipulation is annulled by an act of Congress, though inter partes and by the political department the treaty may still be deemed binding upon the faith of the nation.

But these authorities do conclusively settle that Congress may repeal a treaty by its law, and that the courts, so far from being bound to regard a treaty as the supreme law of the land, are bound to give effect to the law of Congress repealing the operation of the treaty. Judge McLean goes further, and holds that a treaty which requires legislation to give it effect is no treaty until the legislation is passed. Now, if Congress may, under this judicial sanction, repeal the provisions of a treaty, are we in honor bound, are we morally bound here to register the edict of the treaty-making power, when, if the treaty was in existence, and we chose, we could repeal it? Are we bound to sanction a treaty which, when sanctioned, we may repeal?

Look now at a case with which gentlemen are acquainted, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] remembers it; the case of McLeod in 1842. The British government offered to protect McLeod, on the ground that his act, which resulted in the murder of a citizen of the State of New York, was done under the direction of Her Majesty. The British government demanded of Mr. Webster, then our Secretary of State, that McLeod, who was arrested and held by the New York State authorities to be tried for the murder, should be surrendered to the British government, because his act was an act of war, a public act of that government, and not an act of a private British subject against an American citizen. What said Mr. Webster?

In substance his reply was:

> I am very sorry to say that such is the organization of our federal system that McLeod is in the hands of State authorities, and no negotiation or action on the part of the executive department of the Federal Government can take the man out of the hands of the State authorities.

And so it is with all these cases. Our Constitution is such, the organic law of this country is such, the relations of the General Government to the States, and of the different departments of the Government to each other, are such under our Constitution that we are obliged to see, and so is the nation with whom we are treating, whether the action of what is called the treaty-making power is in accord with the powers and functions which are vested in other Departments of the Government, before we can say that the treaty which it claims to have made is operative between the United States and the foreign nation. The doctrine of the civil law bears upon the case: Qui cum alio contrahit vel est, vel esse debet, non ignarus ejus conditionis; that is—

> Whoever contracts with another, either is not or ought not to be ignorant of the capacity of that other to contract. (Wheaton's Elements of International Law, [Lawrence,] 329.)

Therefore, when the British government or the government of Hawaii contracts with the treaty-making power of the United States Government they cannot say to us, "You are bound by the contract merely because it has been made by the President and the Senate." They are obliged to look into the Constitution of this Government to see whether the action of the President and the Senate alone is sufficient to make the compact binding between the United States and Hawaii; whether the mere fact has been so sanctioned by the legislative act, essential to its effect, as that the vinculum juris is thrown around the parties converting the simple pact into contract.

In Wheaton's Elements, page 329, that author says on this point:

> The treaty, when thus ratified, is obligatory upon the contracting states, independently of the auxiliary legislative measures which may be necessary on the part of either in order to carry it into complete effect. Where, indeed, such auxiliary legislation becomes necessary, in consequence of some limitation upon the treaty-making power, expressed in the fundamental laws of the State, or necessarily implied from the distribution of its constitutional powers—such, for example, as a prohibition of alienating the national domain—then the treaty may be considered as imperfect in its obligation until the national assent has been given in the forms required by the municipal constitution.

We insist that in the distribution of the constitutional powers of our system this limitation upon the power of the President and Senate in respect to treaties is necessarily to be implied, to wit: that no stipulation of a treaty involving legislative action in order to its being effectual can bind the United States until Congress, in the exercise of a full discretion, untrammeled by the obligation of passive obedience, shall pass such necessary law.

And Mr. Lawrence, the learned annotator of Wheaton, claims no more than that "if the treaty be within the constitutional limits, free from fraud, and not destructive of any of the great rights and interests of the country, then there is a moral obligation to grant the aid required." And this accords with Chancellor Kent, (1 Kent, page 285.)

And I beg gentlemen to remember that the case of this treaty is different from one merely involving an appropriation of money to carry it into effect. The question here is whether Congress will divest itself for seven years to come, and perhaps for all time, of its functional and constitutional capacity to lay duties; whether this House will demit its great power to lay duties for the purpose of revenue which has been delegated to it by the Constitution in trust for the protection of the people; whether it will surrender this confided trust and paralyze its organic authority by its own consent or concede the right of the President and Senate thus to cede away the authority of Congress vested in it by the fundamental and supreme law of the land.

Have we the power to do this, or ought we to do it, and thus put this constitutional function beyond the reach of our capacity to reclaim it?

I beg leave now to refer the House to some precedents and authorities on this subject.

In 1796 the House of Representatives contested the question with President Washington, a full account of which will be found in the Peter Force Papers.

The House passed the following resolution, by a vote of ayes 57, nays 35:

> Resolved, It being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that, when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress, and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

In 1816 congressional action of like character was taken. (Annals of Congress, first session Fourteenth Congress, page 1018 et seq.) In 1844 Mr. Choate, in his report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the Zoll-Verein treaty, took with great force and effect the very ground I am now taking; and upon that ground the treaty was rejected by a vote of ayes 26, nays 18. He said:

> The committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation upon ancient and uniform practice in respect of the department of Government by which duties on imports shall be imposed. The convention which has been submitted to the Senate changes duties which have been laid by law. It changes them either ex directo and by its own vigor or it engages the faith of the nation and the faith of the Legislature, through which the nation acts, to make the change. In either aspect, it is the President and Senate who, by the instrumentality of negotiation, repeal or materially vary regulations of commerce and laws of revenue which Congress had ordained. More than this; the executive department, by the same instrumentality of negotiation, places it beyond the power of Congress to exceed the stipulated maximum of impost duties for at least three years, whatever exigency may intervene to require it.
> In the judgment of the committee the Legislature, is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue be passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it in terms to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is, indisputably, that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. They think too, that, as the general rule, the Representatives of the people sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently and more discreetly; may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes and rejects than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government.
> To follow, not to lead; to fulfill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect, by negotiation and compact with foreign governments, the legislative will when it has been announced upon the great subjects of trade and revenue, not to interpose with controlling influence, not to go forward with too ambitious enterprise—these seem to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive.

The principle was again asserted in the same way in 1853-'54. General Jackson's position in 1834 in respect to France has been cited in favor of the contrary view. I will merely say in passing that I think that is not a valid precedent for this reason: The debt due by France was not created under the treaty; the treaty merely liquidated an unliquidated claim that had pre-existed, and when the claim was liquidated by treaty, and the Chamber of Deputies in France refused to pay the money, General Jackson said that he would make reprisals on France for the purpose of enforcing the legitimate claims of American citizens, which had antedated the treaty, but which had been sanctioned and recognized by the treaty and were liquidated by it. He would not permit the legislative refusal of the Chamber of Deputies to postpone indefinitely the discharge of a lawful claim which had existed prior to and independently of the treaty itself.

Now, I admit freely (and this is all that gentlemen can claim) that this question is one which has given rise to a vigorous contest, in which giants in former days took part on either side; in which Calhoun and Pinkney were arrayed against Lowndes and others in the Congress of 1816; in which Madison and Macon and Gallatin in 1796 stood on the same side that I now occupy, in opposition to the views of President Washington's administration. But this conflict, as to the relation between the treaty-making and the legislative power, has given rise to provisions in later treaties—certainly in the reciprocity treaty with Canada—in which it was provided that the treaty should not be operative until it had been sanctioned by an act of Congress. In other words, the treaty-making power itself has wisely held that it will not even indicate to a foreign power that the United States are bound by any action of the President and Senate, unless it has been sanctioned by an act of Congress, where a law is needful to give the treaty effect.

But my distinguished opponent, General BANKS, has made a very extraordinary argument which I will not criticise in the terms he has indulged in criticising a portion of the minority report. He says that this treaty is now a complete treaty, because the President has announced it to be binding upon all citizens of the United States, of whom we are a part. Sir, if the President of the United States meant by that proclamation to say that that treaty was binding upon any citizen before the consent of Congress had been given, he has in my judgment transcended his power and has proclaimed that which is untrue as a matter of law. We are not sitting here under the proclamation of the Executive denuded or divested in any degree of our power to examine this treaty and determine whether upon our consciences we think it ought to pass into absolute effect.

The fifth article of this treaty says:

> The present convention shall take effect as soon as it shall have been approved and proclaimed by His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and shall have been ratified and duly proclaimed on the part of the Government of the United States, but not until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America.

The present convention then has not taken effect. How can it take effect? The gentleman says it takes effect as a contract, as a contract between us and Hawaii; yet the treaty itself says it shall not take effect until a law of Congress is passed. How, then, can the gentleman say it has taken effect, when, by the very terms of the paper itself, a law of Congress is necessary to be passed in order that it shall take effect? I think that is a technicality which, according to the language of the distinguished gentleman, would be unworthy of a grave and statesmanlike argument, but might be worthy only of a member of my profession.

The fifth article continues:

> Such assent having been given, and the ratifications of the convention having been exchanged as provided in article 6, the convention shall remain in force for seven years—

Seven years, counting from what time? I answer—

> From the date at which it takes effect, and thus comes into operation.

In other words, this treaty is not to take effect until a law be passed to bring it into operation. How, then, can there be any constitutional question here between the legislative and the treaty-making power? The treaty-making power has itself said to Hawaii: "Understand that the ratification of this treaty by the President and Senate is not binding on the United States until Congress sanctions it; when it sanctions it, then it shall be enforced."

If this be so, gentlemen may ask, what then has been the use of discussing this constitutional question? Sir, despite the derision of gentlemen who say that constitutional questions have practically passed away and are a part of those Bourbon ideas, as they are called in the cant of the day, which are no longer to be respected, yet while I occupy a seat on this floor I shall never permit to pass without challenge any action of this House which I believe will tend to disturb that splendid equilibrium of power which was established by the Constitution of our fathers. That equilibrium between the Federal Government and the State governments; between the different departments, executive, judicial, and legislative, of this Government; and between the two Houses of Congress, are all-important to be sedulously conserved, lest the disturbance of the equilibrium may result in the overthrow and ungearing of the whole system of political machinery, so wisely and well adjusted.

Now, look for a moment at the effect of this claim for the treaty-making power in the form insisted on by gentlemen here. According to the census of 1870, nine States (New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Massachusetts, Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, and Missouri) can carry this House against the other twenty-eight States by force of numbers. According to the same census, nineteen States (the smallest being taken) with only 8,000,000 of people, or one-fifth of the whole population of the country, can carry the Senate by the force of States. If legislation or governmental action depended then on the action of the Senate alone, the Government would be under the control of an oligarchy of States; if legislation depended on this House alone, the Government would be subject to a simple numerical majority. By requiring the concurrent action of the two, no law can be passed without the consent of a majority of the people, estimated by numbers and by States.

Now, mark again: The President and two-thirds of the Senate—that is, twenty-five of the smallest States, comprising only 14,000,000 of people, or a little over one-third of the whole population of the country—can make a treaty; that is to say, one-third of the people of this country can advise and consent to a treaty proposed by the President.

Now, if the claim of the gentleman be correct, that a treaty made by the President and Senate is binding upon this House, divesting it of its constitutional functions, then it follows that one-third of the people of this country, in two-thirds of the smallest States, may take away all the revenue of the country even against the will of the law-making power of Congress; which will only sit here to register the edicts of the treaty-making power, an oligarchy of States.

Mark again. Suppose we pass this law ratifying this treaty; or suppose it becomes a law without our consent, (as gentlemen insist,) then what? Our power to lay duties on these articles can never be gotten back unless the law we are now proposing to pass is repealed; and yet the repeal of that law may be defeated, as I have shown, by one-fifth of the people of this country who live in a majority of States, the smallest in numbers. In other words, one-fifth of the people of this country, counted by numbers, living in a majority of the smallest States, can keep this House from ever getting back the power to lay and collect duties on these articles produced in Hawaii, which we are now asked to yield by this bill. And the President, although such repealing act passes both Houses, may veto the reclaim we make of our powers. What then? It will require two-thirds of both Houses to get back the power; and then one-third of the States, taking the smallest, containing only one-tenth of the population of the United States, in the Senate may defeat the reclaim we make of this our constitutional power.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. And the President and the Senate have the appointment and confirmation of every judge of the Supreme Court and every foreign embassador.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have dwelt on this too much at length. I will not detain the House any longer on that aspect of the question; and I have only dwelt on it for the purpose of showing how important it is that, having the power now in our hands, we should keep it under our own control, and not surrender it, when we may never be able to reclaim it; that there is no body of men so well organized and fitted under our form of government to determine what duties shall be laid and what shall be the regulations of our commerce as this body, which represents the popular majority of the country, the majority of men on whom the action of government is to operate; and we have no right to surrender this power or to abandon our duty to exert it faithfully, unless under circumstances and upon exigencies of the most imperative character.

I shall direct my attention for the balance of my time to the graver question whether this treaty is advisable, condensing what I have to say as far as possible.

The first question to which I address myself then is this: Is this treaty advisable? I say not; because it involves a serious loss of revenue. Since the report of the committee was made the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] has been furnished by the Bureau of Statistics with an important paper, which I have before me, the result of which I will give.

For the last six months, or rather for the six months ending December 31, 1875, the duty on sugar imported from Hawaii into the United States was $369,461.69. If it keeps up at that rate for the whole year ending June 30, 1876, we should lose in revenue under this treaty $738,923.38. So that we give up that amount of revenue by passing this bill. Then in reference to rice, in the same way and from the same paper we will give up $42,735.34; making $781,658.72 on sugar and rice.

I beg the House for one moment to permit me to call their attention to another important view of this matter of loss of revenue. By treaties with several other countries, the provisions of which are similar to that which I read from a single treaty, one of the last made—the treaty made with San Salvador—it is provided that—

> No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the produce or manufactures of the republic of San Salvador * * * than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the produce or manufactures of any foreign country. (18 United States Statutes at Large, page 727.)

That is our treaty with San Salvador, that whatever article we let in duty free at any time from any country shall be let into the United States duty free if exported from San Salvador. Our treaty with this Hawaiian government is that we shall let sugar and rice in duty free. By doing so, under our treaty with San Salvador, we let in the same articles duty free from San Salvador. And I have here a table, which I will ask to be printed with my remarks, by which it will appear that on the sugar exported from other countries to our Atlantic and Pacific seaboard there will be a loss, in round numbers, of $284,000; which, with the loss of duties on the like articles from Hawaii, would make a total loss of over $1,000,000; according to the state of things this year $1,000,000 of revenue relinquished by this treaty.

Mr. SPRINGER. Annually?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir, annually. It was on this view of this and like clauses in treaties that Great Britain claimed through Lord Aberdeen, when the Zollverein treaty was negotiated with the United States, and Mr. Everett, the American minister, admitted the claim, (in 1844,) that if the Zollverein treaty was made between this country and Germany it would by force of other treaties of like character with those we are considering permit the introduction of like articles from other countries as we should admit free of duty under the Zollverein treaty from Germany. That was admitted to be the true construction of such clauses in treaties. Consequently, if you find any country exporting sugar or rice to this, with an article like that I have read in a treaty between this country and that, the effect of this treaty with the Hawaiian government will be to admit sugar and rice from those countries free of duty, as well as from Hawaii. The consequence will be that all these countries will be looking after their interests under these different treaties, and will be sending their articles to flood our markets to the detriment of the sugar and rice interests in this country, and to the greater detriment of our own revenue.

But I say, sir, that the loss to our revenue will be still greater from another cause. There is a provision in this treaty that certain articles if produced in Hawaii shall be admitted free of duty. But who shall prevent parties in other countries from shipping sugar to Hawaii and then reshipping it from Hawaii as Hawaiian sugar? Who will guard our right to duties on those articles so that frauds on our revenue will not be perpetrated? And the consequence may be that revenue from this article of sugar, which to-day gives to us one-fifth of our whole revenue from duties, which is the goose that lays the golden egg, will be year by year undermined and decreased, and the revenues of the Government, so essential to the public credit, will be so far diminished that we will have to lay duties upon some other articles to make up the deficit.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. The Sandwich Islands are capable of producing much larger amounts of sugar. Twelve thousand acres, I understand, are now in cultivation, but five times that amount can be put in successful cultivation. Let this bill giving effect to this extraordinary treaty, which bestows such a bonus on the planters in Hawaii, be passed and the whole Pacific coast will be supplied with Hawaiian sugar to the utter detriment of all revenue from sugar consumed upon that coast.

Now, suppose we are to lose this revenue; how are we to make up the deficit? Why, sir, we have reported a bill here from the Committee of Ways and Means to diminish the taxation upon the consumers of imports into this country. We are trying to lessen the burdens of taxation. And yet here we are giving away, as I shall show directly, over a million this year (and perhaps millions of revenue in the future) to aliens, for what? And we propose to make up the deficit by taxation on our own people.

But, sir, that is not all. I make another point. The Constitution of our country, the Constitution of my country and yours, provides that—

All duties shall be uniform throughout the United States. (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8.)

Is it a uniformity of duty to say that the consumer on the Atlantic seaboard shall pay a duty of from 40 to 60 per cent. on sugar and that the consumer in California and Oregon shall pay none? Is that uniformity? Gentlemen say: "Well, but we only make a freedom from duty in reference to the Hawaiian sugar; and, as you cannot get it on the Atlantic, we do not make a discrimination in favor of the Pacific consumer. It is your misfortune that you are on the Atlantic and not on the Pacific." Is not that paltering in a double sense? Is not that doing indirectly what you admit you cannot do directly? Is it not—if gentlemen will permit me to say so without meaning any reflection—if not a direct invasion of the Constitution, a palpable fraud upon its purpose and spirit? If you stick to the letter, do you not violate the intent of the Constitution?

But more, sir; the language of the Constitution is that—

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another. (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 9.)

The ports of California you throw open to sugar duty free; the ports of the Atlantic you close to sugar unless on payment of a duty of 40 to 60 per cent. Is not a preference thus given to the ports of California for the importation of sugar over the ports on the Atlantic seaboard?

But gentlemen say—I do not know, however, that they concur in what they shall say on the point I am about to make—yet they will have to say one of two things. I put them on the horns of a dilemma. Either the passage of this bill will cheapen sugar to the California consumer or it will not. I do not care which alternative you take; take either and you will be impaled upon a fatal horn. If it does cheapen sugar and is a relinquishment of the duty in favor of the California consumer, then is it not an ununiform duty on sugar? Does it not make a discrimination between the Atlantic consumer and the Pacific consumer? And have you under the Constitution the right to do it? But suppose it does not cheapen sugar, (and I think it will not,) what then? The effect of it will then be that, as it will not cheapen it, the price of sugar to the California consumer being the same, it will be just taking the duty from the Treasury and handing it over into the pockets of the Hawaiian producers. In other words, you are asked to-day to sanction a treaty which takes money out of an almost bankrupt Treasury to feed with bounty aliens across the sea. And how are you to make up the difference? Either by increasing the burdens upon your own people or by continuing burdens which we desire to lift from their shoulders.

Mr. Speaker, the divine Master, in one of those passages in his life when he uttered truths of such universality that they are applicable to all the departments of human affairs, said to one of his apostles, "Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? Of their own children or of strangers?" The apostle answered, "Of strangers." "Then," said the divine Master, "are the children free." In free America for the first time it is proposed that we shall lay a duty upon children in order to pay bounties to aliens. And thus I may charge as a result of this bill, using with a slight change the phrase of the divine Teacher, "Then are the children slaves," and "Then are the aliens free!"

But who is this alien that gets the advantage? Home-born, sir; born upon our own soil, an ex-patriot to Hawaii, shunning the burdens which we bear and claiming benefits which are denied to us and we cannot get; an alien by choice who seeks to feed on bounties supplied to him by taxation on our own people, and which he has avoided by ceasing to be an American citizen and becoming a Hawaiian subject.

But, sir, there is another point of view to which I desire to call attention. Gentlemen say the Hawaiian sugar cannot get to this side of the continent, and therefore it will not interfere with our sugar production. Sir, I am not a protectionist, I am a free-trader; but when I do go free-trading I like to have genuine free trade. Free trade, to be desirable, must be made for the home consumer. The free trade of this bill of which you boast is made for the foreign producer. This free trade does not lift one cent's burden from you or me or from California; but it involves an increase of the burden we will have to bear by requiring other taxation to make up the deficit of revenue resulting from this treaty. There is no free trade in it.

But it is said that Hawaiian sugar cannot get to the Atlantic markets. Why not? Because, it is said, the cost of transportation prevents it, and therefore it cannot come into competition with our own home-grown sugar. That is to say that gentlemen propose to give such advantage to the Hawaiian producers of sugar on the California coast that if we try to transport our Louisiana sugar to that coast at such heavy freights we will be unable to compete with Hawaiian sugar by reason of the advantages given to the foreigner.

Now, sir, the duties we lay upon foreign sugar are not strictly protective duties. They are highly revenue duties at the rate of from 40 to 60 per cent. The amount of revenue derived from that source is $38,000,000. Now you propose to take away the revenue duties, which help to some extent our own planters, and give the advantage to the foreigner. You do that in view of the fact that every man who is a sugar-planter here pays tariff duties for all he uses on his plantation, for everything he consumes, and pays also heavy internal-revenue taxes for much that he consumes; and yet when these persons slip the noose of our tax-gatherers by becoming aliens, and get out of our hands so that we cannot tax them, you say by this bill that we will pay these men, in addition to their exemption from taxation, these enormous bounties at the expense of and by the taxation of our own people.

Now it is true that in the raw state, much sugar will not go from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast; but there is a form in which it will go, and which gives great advantage to somebody. I do not mean to say that this is a job. The only gentleman with whom I have talked on this subject, except with members of Congress, is a gentleman who is chief justice and minister plenipotentiary of Hawaii, and I take pleasure in saying that he has so conducted himself toward me as to enable me to say upon this floor that I believe him to be a fair-minded and honorable gentleman; but I say that, whatever may be the purpose of the persons who are urging the passage of this treaty, it is going to make in its results a fat job for aliens at the expense of our own children.

Now our sugar does go to the Pacific coast in the form of refined sugar; and their sugar will come from the Pacific coast in the refined form, because the cost of the article in the refined shape will bear transportation while it will not in the raw state. One of these great California refiners who may own a good fat plantation at Hawaii will raise his raw sugar and bring it to California, where it is refined, and then transport it to the Atlantic States free of duty; and it will then come in competition with the productions of the Atlantic refiners; so that in the competition between the Atlantic and Pacific refiners you give to the Pacific refiners an advantage of 40 to 60 per cent. on the cost of the raw material, which will by reaction operate injuriously on the home producer of the raw sugar. Now is that fair under a Government of equal laws intended to bear equally upon all parties?

Mr. Speaker, if you will look into this treaty you will not find much free trade in it. Raw sugar comes in free; but not refined sugar. This is for the benefit of the manufacturer of sugar; but the raw sugar comes in in competition with the agriculturist. So, too, in the case of hides, in which the grazier is interested. Raw hides are admitted free; but dressed hides, for the benefit of the manufacturer at the cost of the consumer, come in with a duty upon them. You will find the same principle all through the treaty, which was made for the benefit of certain manufactures of this country, but made without any advantage to the agriculturist or the grazier.

One single remark further on this head, for I must hurry on, and I will say it in a single sentence. It is for the interest of this Congress and of the country that we should adopt no legislation that shall array sections in hostility to each other. We should not array Californian interests in competition with Atlantic interests. We should not say to California, your interests are diverse from Atlantic interests, and we will therefore make one law to suit you and another to suit the Atlantic. That, sir, engenders strife, and dissensions, and discontents, by suggesting diversity instead of unity of interests, which ought to be put down among the different sections of the country. They should be bound together by the bonds of a common interest and in a common brotherhood, with equal rights and privileges under a just and equal Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, what are the advantages which it is alleged will be derived from this treaty? It is said that we get a market in the Sandwich Islands with a population of 56,000 people, about half the population of the cities of Washington and Georgetown. What an enormous market for 40,000,000 of people to be reaching out for! And what do they consume? Six hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars of our products, which is about $11 a head. And who are they? Mr. Speaker, it is a sad thing, but the results accord with all history in cases where civilization and barbarism meet. When we sent to the Sandwich Islands over a half century ago the missionaries of the Gospel, the heathen played the cannibal with our civilization. But we have turned the tables upon him; and civilization is playing the cannibal to the heathen. A population of 400,000 a century ago has dwindled down to a little over 49,000; and civilization is cannibalizing the Sandwich Islands. There are, however, but 7,000 of other nations there; and that is the market we are claiming with so much eagerness. For six hundred and ninety-five dollars' worth of products sold we give up a revenue of over a million; we give up annually $2 out of the Treasury to sell half that amount to the islands. What a magnificent bargain the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] proposes to the country!

Well, what is the tariff that they now lay upon us? Only 10 per cent. That is all of duty released and the extent of our advantage. Cannot we get along well with their 10 per cent. duty and without its being remitted? Coal is free. We gain nothing by the treaty, therefore, so far as coal is concerned, and only 10 per cent. on other articles. But it is said that we will gain the carrying trade. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has answered this, and I quote from his able speech:

We are to have the carrying trade. We have it already and no nation can take it from us, nor will any attempt to take it, for it is worth nothing. I will give you the figures of their trade in the last year of which we have returns, 1872. Their records inform us that there were 146 merchant vessels and steamers entered at Hawaiian ports, 91 of which were American, only 16 were English, 6 were German, 9 belonged to other nations, and 25 were Hawaiian. Of the 98,647 tons of shipping, 73,975 were American, 6,514 were Hawaiian, and but 7,741 were British. Of 47 whaling-vessels calling at the island ports during the year, 42 were American, 2 Hawaiian, and 3 British. Of less than 16,000,000 pounds of sugar exported during that year, 14,500,000 came to this country; of 33,000 pounds of coffee exported, we received 34,000; and of 1,349,503 pounds of rice and paddy, we received 1,317,203 pounds. In view of these figures, who will say that we are not in possession of their carrying trade?

It thus appears that we are buying by this treaty what we have already; we are paying over a million dollars a year to Hawaii to give us what we have without price! But, then, gentlemen say, and this strikes them with very great force, we want a half-way house on the great Pacific Ocean, where those young whales are disporting themselves in the animated style described by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] We want a half-way house on the Pacific. What for? My friend from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY,] whose speech does him very great credit and honor, said that we want to acquire Hawaii. On the other side of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said: "O, no, I think we want the treaty in order not to acquire Hawaii." Well, gentlemen must settle their disputes among themselves. I cannot compose such strifes.

In my judgment the acquisition of Hawaii would be almost if not absolutely fatal. So far as my judgment is concerned, I would not take it as a gracious gift. Suppose you had war, and you have a chronic fear of war with Great Britain, with whom you have not had a war for sixty years. The bugaboo of the American children is brought forward here to-day to scare this House into now passing this treaty. Great Britain may get Hawaii, gentlemen say. If we take possession of Hawaii and Great Britain wants it, what a time we will have to hold it! What an enormous expense upon an already overburdened people to hold on to this gracious gift of Hawaii!

But furthermore, I would not have it, because its acquisition would increase the patronage of this Government; the prime source of all this rank corruption which is creating this dreadful stench in the land. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrefying sores." Acquire Hawaii, and we will have more post-traderships for sale. I am opposed to it because it would enlarge the Federal power and patronage, either over a merely provincial colony, or over a State to be composed of converted cannibals of an alien race.

Gentlemen say that Great Britain has her colonies and we must have them too. There is a reason for her colonial policy which has no place with us. Great Britain is a little sea-girt island, that is not larger than the Commonwealth of Virginia; I mean the "old Commonwealth of Virginia;" not larger than Texas. She wants to get abroad beyond the seas, and she acquires colonies in order to make her dominion commensurate with her power. But what do we want with more dominion? In the name of God, stretching from sea to sea, from the gulf to the lakes, have we not enough domain?

No pent-up Utica confines our powers,
But the whole boundless continent is ours.

What do we want with more? In addition, I am prepared to show if I had the time—but I have not the time to say all that I should say upon the direct question under discussion—I am prepared to show that while the increase of patronage in the British government strengthens and conserves her institutions, in this Government it is directly the other way, and is a disturbing force which may lead to the overthrow of our institutions. Limitation on power, as the best means of limiting patronage and its corrupting influences, is the only way in which this Government can achieve the great aim of its founders and the great hopes of its friends. And I say to gentlemen now, I fling abroad here the declaration to be heard and read wherever I may be heard or read—and I believe I may speak for those whom a factious press derisively terms the "ex-confederates" around me—that there are no men on this floor, no men who represent constituencies, who are more full of purpose than the people of the South; of honest, earnest, and manly purpose to make this American Union the greatest and most glorious country on the face of God's earth. But increasing the patronage and power of this Federal Government will only disturb that equilibrium of our Federal system, so essential to be preserved, and tend really to bring the Government to its destruction.

But it will end in the acquisition of the islands if we ever begin to tinker with them; if we ever begin to finger them we will acquire them. Gentlemen say it is necessary for us to acquire them, essential to our safety. Why? Great Britain wants them, they say, and Great Britain may take them, and thus deprive us of them, and give her a great commercial advantage and a dangerous advantage in case of war. Why has not Great Britain taken these islands all this time? During our four years of civil war, when the brethren of this country were divided, why did not Great Britain seize upon the prize then?

But, gentlemen, if you are going to take the Sandwich Islands for the purpose of saving California, will you tell me whether it will not be necessary to take the Fiji Islands in order to save your new acquisition of the Sandwich Islands? And if you take the Fiji Islands in order to save our Sandwich Islands, then will it not be necessary to take Australia in order to save the Fiji Islands? As we already have Alaska, will gentlemen tell me why it is not necessary for us to push our acquisitions over into Kamtchatka, and through the Behring Straits into the polar sea, until the flag of the country floats from the north pole itself?

But do not gentlemen remember that this argument does not suit the facts of very recent history? Do you remember that we acquired Alaska a few years ago, between which territory and our other Pacific possessions British Columbia is interposed? If we are really afraid of Great Britain seizing our Pacific States by acquiring Hawaii, is it not clear there is more danger of her seizing Alaska, when she is between us and Alaska, than there is of her seizing California from Honolulu when the Pacific coast is protected by the whole back country?

But there is no soundness in this argument. We have Bermuda and Jamaica and British Columbia and Canada right at our doors, right in our front and on our flanks, and for sixty long years, through the years of our civil strife, Great Britain has never used one of them as a lever with which to overturn our Government or to menace the safety of this country. The proximity of her colonies to us and their distance from the mother-country enable us to hold Great Britain under a recognizance to keep the peace, and the interests of those in language, commerce, and a common civilization will keep peace between the two countries unless ambition or folly should tempt us to aggressions and foreign wars, thus digging the grave of our Republic, from which there would be no resurrection but in the new form of a military empire!

There is a policy which I think is broader, more frank and manly than the one proposed. You ask, how shall we be safe? Suppose Great Britain should undertake to acquire the Sandwich Islands. Sir, in that event I would speak in the language of Mr. Webster quoted in the report of the committee; I would use the diplomacy of Mr. Everett in his celebrated dispatch of 1851 in respect to Cuba; I would adopt the declaration of Mason, Buchanan, and Soulé, in the Ostend manifesto of 1854; I would announce the policy of this Government for more than fifty years, that no European power shall gain a new foothold upon this American continent or the outlying islands that shall menace the safety of the American Union; and that sentiment, which is neither threatening nor aggressive, but the purpose to maintain a proper self-defense under the international law, has never been flung out to Great Britain or any other power on earth that it has not staid the hand of that power in acquiring territory upon the American soil.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. TUCKER. I would be obliged to my friend from New York if he would give me five or ten minutes.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly. I cheerfully accede to the gentleman's request, provided the time does not come out of my hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The arrangement suggested requires unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Virginia will proceed for five or ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish gentlemen to forget what was said by my able and eloquent friend from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] the other day. Gentlemen must remember that we have a treaty to-day with the Hawaiian Islands—a treaty which I venture to say will be found by any gentleman who will read it to secure us all that we need in our relations with that country. That treaty secures to us reciprocity of commerce and navigation with Hawaii. Equality of duties with reference to any other nation is secured to the United States products. No favor, privilege, or immunity can be accorded to any other nation which shall not at once be accorded to the United States, if gratuitous; or upon like compensation if to be made upon compensation by any other country. No advantage to any trade in Hawaiian vessels is permitted over trade in United States vessels; no duties of tonnage can be laid on United States vessels not imposed on their own; steam-vessels of the United States carrying mails across the Pacific are to have free access to the islands to refit, refresh, and land passengers and conduct business in the ports of Hawaii. Whale-ships are put on the same footing, and so war-vessels; personal privileges of the most important character are accorded to United States citizens. Deserters are to be surrendered. Liberty of conscience is secured to American citizens. In case of wrecks or stress of weather, all hospitality is accorded to our vessels; and the respective mails of the United States and of the islands are permitted to be distributed upon the most liberal terms. What does the treaty now under consideration give us that we have not by the treaty already in existence substantially provided for?

Notwithstanding the criticisms of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, I say that this treaty with Hawaii, which we are called upon to sanction, gives us no foothold in the island at all. It excludes others, but gives us nothing in the territory. It does not give us a port; it does not give us a lease-hold or any other hold upon any portion of the territory or dominion of Hawaii. It provides that no special privilege or right of use shall be given in the dominion or territory to any other power; but it does not provide that no privilege shall be given to any other power equal to that accorded to us. The distinction I make is one which I think is very clear, although the gentleman from Massachusetts did not perceive it as he usually does clear distinctions. The distinction is that if a special privilege, that is, one not applicable to anybody else, were given to any other nation, that would be prohibited by the terms of the treaty; but if the Hawaiian government merely gives to Great Britain the same privilege accorded to us and to other nations, that is not a special privilege but a general privilege to all.

Again, the language of the treaty is, that the Hawaiian government "shall not grant, &c.;" and in an opinion of Mr. Cushing given many years ago he draws a distinction between the word "grant," which means "a free grant" without consideration, and the passing of a benefit for a consideration. The language used in this treaty is "grant"—"shall not grant any special privilege." It may be given upon compensation; it may be sold.

But that is not all; the treaty provides that there shall not be any lease or possession given of any part of the territory; but it does not exclude Hawaii from making a treaty with Great Britain by which that country may afford a protectorate to the islands, nor does it forbid an alliance offensive and defensive. Why, sir, the openings in the treaty through which the Hawaiian government may escape in order to make treaties with other nations are as wide as a barn-door. Again, no treaty shall be made, it says, with any other power to give the same privileges of freedom from duties accorded by this treaty to the United States. But no treaty does not mean no law; and if the Hawaiian government chooses to pass a law admitting English goods free of duty, it is not within the terms of the prohibition of this treaty which you are called upon to ratify. That government is prohibited from making a treaty, but is not prohibited from lessening or doing away with all duties by legislation.

I think, therefore, that this whole treaty is illusory. But, sir, the treaty is vicious in this respect: that its very terms indicate (and I wish gentlemen to read it before they vote upon this bill) that if Great Britain at the end of seven years shall induce the Hawaiian government to put an end to this treaty and shall be enabled to effect a treaty with the islands of like character with this or obtaining territorial privileges, this Government concedes and is by this treaty estopped to deny the right of Great Britain to get a foot-hold in the islands such as she is by this treaty supposed to be shut out from. By making a treaty that no foreign power shall during the seven years gain any such advantage, you make a concession of the principle that after seven years you will not object to it. I say that is contrary to American policy. If the possession of Hawaii by any European power endangers our peace or safety, the ground on which we will put our opposition is not that we will obtain the consent or contract of Hawaii not to do so, but that it shall not be done. The safety, peace, and security of our Union demand that no such foot-hold shall be given.

The treaty of Utrecht made provision against certain European combinations ad conservandum in Europa equilibrium—to preserve the balance of power in Europe, for the safety and peace of its peoples; and, on like principles, we ad conservandum in American equilibrium, make a like declaration here, as a security to the peace and institutions of the New World.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said what I intended to say on this subject. Our true policy, in my judgment, is to grant special privileges to no nation, but equal rights to all; or, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

Let Europe and Asia commune through our transcontinental lines with each other in trade and travel. Let our land be, as Columbus dreamed it was, but the outer boundary of the Indies. Lighten burdens on all industries, on commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. Abolish privileges to the few at the expense of the many. Give no bounties to aliens by the taxation of your own children. Retrench in public and in private affairs. Scourge out the plunderers and the money-changers from the temple of our liberties. Above all, sir, let there be peace, peace among ourselves, as the greatest security we have for peace with the world. For I say, taking up in echo the eloquent language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day, that while we have proved by our civil strife that the boys in blue and the boys in gray may have been a fair match for each other, yet we have demonstrated that the blue and gray, united in one brotherhood, are and will be more than a match for the world in arms. [Applause.]

What we need is to foster the spirit of fraternity between those lately involved in civil strife by the cultivation in each of a generous respect for the conscientious convictions and heroic devotion of the other, and of a broad and catholic charity for those natural sensibilities the presence of which is honorable to each and the absence of which would be discreditable to both. In this temper each may turn from the dead issues of the past to honest and earnest co-operation in this active present for the realization of the splendid possibilities of a noble destiny for our common country. And in this sense, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, let us press forward toward the mark for the prize of our high calling under the good providence of God; a calling fraught with true glory to the American Union, and with blessings to mankind; a mission, through peace among ourselves and a liberal foreign policy in trade and intercourse, to induce and command peace with all nations; and thus, by the practice of the principles of the Prince of Peace, to become, as we should and will be if true to our great duties, the peace-makers of the world.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, called the previous question, (which was seconded, and the main question ordered;) when he yielded half of his closing hour to

Mr. BANKS, who addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. WOOD, of New York, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LEVY. I am paired with Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. SPRINGER. On this question I am paired with Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to state that Mr. HILL, of Georgia, is paired with Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania. If they were here Mr. KELLEY would vote "no," and Mr. HILL would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock, and I ask also that it be understood by unanimous agreement that to-morrow no business shall be transacted; that there shall be a merely formal meeting, and an adjournment without the transaction of business. I desire this proposition to be first submitted.

SESSION OF THE HOUSE ON TUESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana that it be ordered that the meeting of the House to-morrow be merely formal without the transaction of business; that the House shall meet and then adjourn?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Mississippi Levees, reported as a substitute for the House bills Nos. 1175, 1498, and 1673, a bill (H. R. No. 3430) to repair and rebuild the levees of the Mississippi River, to reclaim the alluvial lands thereof, and to improve its navigation and promote and protect its commerce; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order for Wednesday, May 17, after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that this subject-matter belongs to the Committee of the Whole, and if it does, it is subject to any point of order which may be raised. In order to avoid the necessity of the reading of the bill to-night, I reserve all points of order upon it. I must also object to any special order that does not except reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ELLIS. I am willing to make that exception.

Mr. ELLIS's motion was then agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now make the motion for a recess until half past seven o'clock for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Make it eight o'clock; it is half past five o'clock now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock.

APPOINTMENT ON A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before that motion is put, the Chair desires to announce that in the absence of Mr. CRAPO he has appointed Mr. CONGER a member of the Committee on the Louisiana Investigation.

The question was put on Mr. HOLMAN'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 65, noes 92.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have called for the yeas and nays on the motion for a recess. I trust the House will see that it will be disgraceful in us to neglect business in this way when we are about to waste so much time. [Loud cries of "Regular order."] I insist on the yeas and nays on the motion to take a recess. [Renewed cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that motion was made I called for the yeas and nays on the motion to take a recess. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion for a recess; and on a division there were—ayes 32, noes 147.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth not voting in favor thereof.

The question recurred on Mr. HOSKINS'S motion.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that motion, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain requests for leave of absence.

Mr. JENKS was granted leave of absence until Monday, 15th instant.

Mr. WOODWORTH was granted leave of absence for fifteen days from next Friday.

Mr. CHAPIN was granted leave of absence for one week from Monday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to do no business to-morrow. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order pending the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was not aware that the motion to adjourn was pending.

The question was taken on Mr. HOSKINS'S motion; and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of certain residents of the State of California, and stockholders in the corporation known as the Central Pacific Railroad Company. They say that "the corporation known as the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California was incorporated under the laws of the State of California, on the 27th of June, A. D. 1861, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from the city of Sacramento to the eastern boundary of said State, a distance of about one hundred and fifteen miles.

"That by virtue of certain acts of Congress, the said railroad company became authorized to construct its railroad from said eastern boundary of said State, eastward until it should meet the railroad then being constructed by the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

"That in pursuance of the authority conferred by said incorporation, and by the acts of Congress aforesaid, the said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California constructed a line of railroad from the city of Sacramento to Promontory Point, in the Territory of Utah, a distance of six hundred and ninety miles.

"That the capital stock of said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California was named in the articles of incorporation at $8,500,000, divided into 85,000 shares of $100 each.

"That at the time of said incorporation there was subscribed to said capital stock as follows: Leland Stanford, one hundred and fifty shares; Mark Hopkins, one hundred and fifty shares; C. P. Huntington, one hundred and fifty shares; Charles Crocker, one hundred and fifty shares; and said persons were in said articles named as directors of said company, and now are directors thereof, and have, from said incorporation to the present time, been the only managers thereof, excepting that one Edwin B. Crocker, a brother of said Charles, was for a short time one of said directors or managers.

"That your petitioner, John R. Robinson, became a stockholder in said company in the year 1862, and your other petitioners in 1864.

"That the various gifts and subsidies of money, bonds, and lands, made to said corporation by the United States, the States of California and Nevada, and various counties and cities in the said State of California, have exceeded in value the sum of $125,000,000, and that there have been issued bonds, secured by mortgages on said road, to the amount of $27,000,000.

"That the portion of the road built by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, lying between Ogden and Promontory Point, both in the Territory of Utah, has been purchased and is now owned and operated by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and that the total distance from the city of Sacramento is about seven hundred and forty miles."

I may be excused for particularly reciting the facts stated in the petition on account of the importance of the prayer which is made in it, and if the facts themselves should be found true on investigation, they are well worthy of the attention of the Senate. The petitioners further say that "instead of building said railroad in as economical a manner as was possible, and for the best interests of the stockholders of said company, the said managers, in order and for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the petitioners and other stockholders, and depriving them of their just share in the profits of the enterprise, and to make Congress and certain officers of the executive department of the Government, and more especially the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, believe that the said road had cost a much larger sum than it really did, and to obtain from Congress more favorable legislation on behalf of said railroad, the said managers formed a certain firm known as Charles Crocker & Co., and of which all of said managers were members, to which firm they let contracts for building said road, at prices greatly in advance of the value of the work to be done; the profits whereof were divided among said managers for their own use.

"That in the year 1867 the said managers procured one William E. Brown, one Theodore J. Milliken, and one Benjamin R. Crocker, all of whom were clerks or employés of said managers, to form a certain corporation known as the Contract and Finance Company; that although said Brown, Milliken, and B. R. Crocker appear as the corporators thereof, yet the real parties in interest were the said managers, Stanford, Hopkins, Huntington, and Charles Crocker; and that the said managers, acting as directors of said railroad company, contracted with themselves, in the name of said Contract and Finance Company, under the pretense of building and equipping the said railroad, at prices greatly in excess of the work to be done or material to be furnished, whereby all the funds, assets, and property of said railroad company, other than its road-bed and rolling-stock, were transferred to the said Contract and Finance Company, for the use of said managers, in fraud of your petitioners and other stockholders of said railroad company and of the Government of the United States.

"That said Central Pacific Railroad was completed and operated over the whole length thereof, for the carriage of passengers and freight, on or about the 8th day of May, 1869; and that the net earnings thereof, over and above its operating expenses, from said last date to the 31st day of December, 1875, have been about forty millions of dollars.

"That said managers of said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and said Charles Crocker & Co., and said Contract and Finance Company built said road with as little outlay of money as was possible to have the same accepted by the commissioners appointed by the Government and to keep the cars running thereon; that much of the trestle-work and many of the culverts and waterways on said road are of the most temporary character; that a large portion of the ties are of inferior pine wood, unfit for the purpose, and are now rotten and unsafe for the passage of trains thereon; that a great portion of the iron rails are now in bad order and need replacing, and are not safe; that the depots, station-houses, and workshops along the line, excepting one shop at Sacramento, are slight and cheap wooden structures, and in marked contrast with the fine stone buildings used for like purposes on the Union Pacific road; and that a large number of the locomotives on said road are also of inferior quality and workmanship.

The petitioners represent that, "if Congress will cause said road to be examined by competent engineers, it will be found that the whole line of road built by said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California can be completed according to the manner in which it was built for a sum not to exceed $35,000,000.

"That the said managers do not expend upon the road-bed, bridges, trestle-work, culverts and water-ways, rails and ties of said road, or upon the rolling-stock and motive power thereon, sufficient money to keep the same in good repair and to render the same safe for the transportation of persons and property; and your petitioners represent that most of the delay and stoppage of business on said road during the past winter was caused by the inferior character of the road-bed, rails, and ties thereon, the same not being of sufficient strength to bear the weight of the snow-plows necessary to be used in removing snow from said track; and your petitioners further represent that to put said road in good order and bring it up to the standard of a first-class road, so that passenger-trains could pass over it with safety at the ordinary rates of speed at which such trains are moved on main roads in New York, Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts, would require an immediate expenditure of about two and a half million dollars.

"And your petitioners further aver and represent that since the completion of said Central Pacific Railroad the managers thereof, from and with the moneys and assets acquired by them in the building of said road in the dishonest and wicked manner before shown, and from the earnings thereof, have constructed a certain railroad known as the California and Oregon Railroad, and also a certain other railroad known as the San Joaquin Valley Railroad, and also a large part of the road known as the Western Pacific Railroad, and also a certain other railroad known as the San Francisco Bay Railroad, all within the State of California; and also a large part of a certain railroad in the States of Virginia and West Virginia known as the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad.

"And from the said moneys and assets so as aforesaid acquired by said managers they have purchased those certain railroads known as the California Pacific Railroad, the San Francisco and Oakland Railroad, the San Francisco and Alameda Railroad, the Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad, the San Francisco and San José Railroad, and also a large number of steamboats running on the inland waters of California.

"That the said managers issued bonds upon said railroads as follows:

On the California and Oregon	$8,080,000
On the San Joaquin Valley	6,080,000
On the Western Pacific	2,735,000
On the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda	1,500,000

"And that a portion of said bonds have been sold and the proceeds thereof received by said managers, and the balance thereof have been divided among said managers, who claim to own the same.

"That all of the aforesaid railroads, excepting the California Pacific, the Los Angeles and San Pedro, and the San Francisco and San José, have been consolidated with said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad, and the said Stanford, Hopkins, Huntington, and Charles Crocker named themselves as directors and managers thereof.

"That the capital stock of said new corporation was made to appear to be $100,000,000, and the said managers have issued to themselves about $54,000,000 thereof, claiming to have paid the company therefor, and to be entitled to the same; but your petitioners aver and represent that said managers have not paid therefor, or any part thereof, excepting the one hundred and fifty shares which each subscribed at the time of the original incorporation as aforesaid, except the same was paid for from or with the money fraudulently and dishonestly abstracted by them from the funds of said corporation."

These petitioners further say that "at no time, either before or since their becoming the managers of said railroad corporation, did either Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, or Charles Crocker have or own money, assets, or property of any kind exceeding the sum of $50,000; and all of them together never did and do not own over $150,000, except the money and assets so as aforesaid fraudulently and dishonestly acquired.

"That at the time of said original incorporation of said Central Pacific Railroad of California, and for some time prior and subsequent thereto, the said Stanford, in partnership with a brother, carried on business as oil merchants.

"That said Huntington and Hopkins were partners in the hardware business.

"That said Charles Crocker was in the business of retailing calico, tape, pins, and needles.

"That all of said persons were residents of the county of Sacramento, and by a law of the State of California every person is required to make, once in each year, a return under oath to the assessor of the county in which he resides of the property owned by him. That for the years 1860, 1861, and 1862, being the year of the said incorporation, and the year before and after, the said managers made returns as follows:

	1860.	1861.	1862.
L. Stanford & Brother	$53,700	$43,600	$32,950
Charles Crocker	26,750	29,450	25,350
Mark Hopkins	14,200	13,900	9,700
C. P. Huntington	8,930	8,680	7,225
Huntington & Hopkins	15,430	21,405	34,115
Total	119,260	117,035	109,340

"That with the moneys acquired as aforesaid, and from the present earnings of said Central Pacific Railroad, the said managers are now building the railroad known as the Southern Pacific Railroad, and said managers claim to own the same, irrespective of the petitioners and the other stockholders of said Central Pacific Railroad.

"The petitioners further represent that the said managers claim that all the depot grounds, town sites, water-tanks, and sources of supply of water along said Central Pacific Railroad are owned by them in private ownership, although the same are nearly in almost every instance situate upon lands granted by Congress to said railroad company; and the said managers claim to own the lands and buildings in the city and county of San Francisco used by said railroad company as offices."

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what the document is he is reading?

Mr. SARGENT. I am presenting a petition. Every statement which I have read is pertinent and necessary for the action of the Senate, and, if true, requires legislation by Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was inquiring for information merely. I have no comment to make.

Mr. SARGENT. Early in the session the Senate, on my motion, passed a resolution instructing a prominent committee of this body to inquire into these matters and report upon them, and I have no doubt that the statements here made, at any rate if proof be taken upon them, will be of some assistance to that committee in reporting their conclusions to the Senate. These petitioners further say "that the said managers have, with the moneys acquired as aforesaid, purchased a considerable interest in the express business of Wells, Fargo & Co., and have given to said Wells, Fargo & Co. the exclusive right to do express business upon and over all said railroads; and have purchased a majority of interest in certain coal mines, and have, as directors of said railroad companies, made contracts with themselves for supplying said railroads with coal; and have, with the moneys so acquired as aforesaid, bought large tracts of land in the city and county of San Francisco, and in various parts of the State of California and the State of Oregon; and have, with the money so as aforesaid acquired, built for themselves large and costly places for residence in the cities of San Francisco and Sacramento; and that said managers claim to own said stock in said Wells, Fargo & Co., and said coal mines, and all the other property in this paragraph mentioned, in their own right and irrespective of your petitioners and the other stockholders of said railroad company."

I will remark that it seems railroad building is very profitable. Credit Mobilier sinks into insignificance. The Government is inexcusably negligent if it does not take some means to secure the payment of its interest and an adequate sinking fund out of this bonanza of wealth.

The petitioners further represent "that by reason of having the control of such large sums of money and property the said managers possess great influence, and have, so far, succeeded in preventing Congress or any State legislative body from inquiring into their wicked and dishonest practices; and that said managers have expended and paid out large sums of money to influence legislation in their favor and to prevent the passage of adverse measures, both in Congress and in the Legislature of this State, and it is the boast of said managers that, by the use of money, no legislation adverse to them can be had."

That certainly is a very important statement. If they have made any such boast Congress should know it; and if it is true Congress should know it.

The petitioners "have often demanded from said managers an account of their acts and doings in the premises, and to be paid what might be rightfully due to them, and each of them, as their proportion of the earnings and profits of said railroads; but said managers have refused to account to your petitioners, or either of them, or to pay to them, or either of them, their share of said earnings and profits, and have accused your petitioners of trying to levy black-mail upon them, because your petitioners made the demands as aforesaid.

"That although your petitioners have a remedy at law to enforce their rights in the premises, and the courts of this State are presided over by honorable and learned judges, yet your petitioners are all men of small means, and it is well known to your honorable bodies that the said managers, having the control of so much money, and having in their employment a large staff of eminent counsel, the delays of the law can be invoked to hinder and prevent your petitioners from establishing their rights, except at a cost that would be beyond their ability to pay.

"And now, in their extreme need, they come to you, the supreme law-making power of the nation. It is the boast of the people of all countries governed by the common law, that there is no station so high as to be above its reach, none so low as not to be entitled to its protection. In this case we present you the two extremes—those of whom we complain, gilding their moral deformities and corruptions with ill-gotten wealth, stand to-day on the pinnacle of that power which is attained by monetary influence, while the petitioners, having by these unfaithful trustees been deprived of the fruits of the labor which they have invested in this railroad enterprise, are poor and lowly indeed.

"The interests of the Government are identical with those of the petitioners. The Government is entitled to 5 per cent. on the net earnings of the road from the time of completion, and it is of importance to it to determine what charges are properly deductable from the gross earnings, so as to arrive at the true sum of the net earnings. And if, as the petitioners aver, the property and earnings of the said Southern Pacific Railroad belong to the said Central Pacific, then such earnings will largely increase the amount which should be paid to the Government.

"By the act of Congress passed July 1, 1862, it is provided that whenever the earnings of the road amount to 10 per cent. upon its cost, Congress may regulate the rates to be charged for the transportation of persons and property thereon; and if, as the petitioners aver, the said road cost less than $40,000,000, then the time has long since arrived when the power reserved by Congress can be exercised, and it will be of great advantage and benefit to the whole people of the United States so to do, and relieve them from the oppressive and arbitrary exactions made by the managers of this corporation for their own benefit.

"Again, if, as the petitioners aver, the said road was built from and with the subsidies of bonds and lands made by the United States to said company, and the subsidies made by the States of Nevada and California, and various other counties and cities of said State of California, then the issue of the bonds to the amount of $27,000,000, and which now constitute a first lien on said road, was improperly and fraudulently made, and Congress should, by appropriate enactment, compel said managers to take up, cancel, and retire said bonds, and the claim of the United States would then be the first lien upon said road, and be fully protected.

"And the petitioners humbly pray that your honorable bodies will appoint a committee of your two Houses, to sit in the city of San Francisco during your adjournment, with full power to take testimony, and inquire into the affairs of said railroad company, said firm of Charles Crocker & Co., and said Contract and Finance Company; and that all legislation now proposed by the managers of said railroad company may be postponed until after such committee shall have reported the true facts in the premises.

"And the petitioners undertake and promise to establish and make good all the averments and allegations in this petition contained."

The petition is signed by John R. Robinson, Anthony Egl, and Anthony Coolot. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Railroads, and trust the committee will give it an early and careful consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Carpenter, pay-inspector in the United States Navy, praying compensation for services rendered as paymaster while at the same time discharging his regular duties as pay-inspector. This is a sort of supplement to a petition already in the hands of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I move that this paper be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have received from the Secretary of the Interior and from the Commissioner of Pensions a communication which I desire to have printed for the use of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. They represent that there is a great present necessity for a new building for the office of the Commissioner of Pensions. I have also a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who ask permission to take the material of the old jail building and remove the same, and construct another in a different part of the District, and asking for an appropriation to enable them to do it. I ask unanimous consent to have these papers printed for the use of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing of these papers for the use of the committee? The Chair hears no objection, and the order to print will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 412) to extend the time for presenting claims to the Court of Claims and to the southern claims commission, to report it adversely, and to move its indefinite postponement. The Senator from Alabama, who introduced the bill, [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE,] not being in his seat, I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; reported it with amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the passage of an act for the relief of Mrs. Minerva Shipley and Miss Nancy Spaulding, daughters of Daniel Spaulding, who served, as is alleged, in the war of 1812, accompanied also by a petition of the heirs themselves, asking that a special act be passed for the relief of such heirs and a sum of money given to them in gross, and also praying for a pension, have instructed me to report them back and recommend that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions so far as they ask a special act for relief or a sum of money in gross, and that so far as they relate to the claim for pension they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Hannah Waters, of Horn Island, Mississippi Sound, praying for compensation for certain beef-cattle and swine taken from her during the rebellion for the use of the Army of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 87) to repeal the last clause of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 724) granting arrears of increase of pension to Francis A. Liebschutz, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1204) granting a pension to Henry H. Wharff, of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MERRIMON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 819) for the relief of Joseph W. Ireland, of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. At the request of one of the parties named in the bill, I ask unanimous consent, without previous notice, to introduce a bill for the relief of James Tebault and others, to be referred to the Committee on Claims.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 820) for the relief of James Tebault and others; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 821) authorizing the sale and disposition of the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 822) for the relief of Samuel A. Wilkins; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers relating to the case on the files of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONOVER it was Ordered, That Mrs. E. Call Long have permission to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Lena Bensinger be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DORSEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ANGELINE LOGAN.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there be no resolutions, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a little bill. After I state the circumstances I do not think there will be any objection to it. This bill passed the House at one time and came to the Senate too late; it passed the Senate one time and went to the House too late. It involves about $95 and is to pay a poor colored woman for washing done during the late rebellion. Her claim has been delayed from time to time. A bill for her relief has passed both Houses but never both Houses at the same session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has it ever been rejected by either House?

Mr. WRIGHT. No, sir; it never has been. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of Angeline Logan. It directs that there be paid to Angeline Logan the sum of $95.25 for services rendered to soldiers of the United States as laundress and nurse in hospitals in Van Buren and Little Rock, Arkansas, during the years 1864 and 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is on the Calendar House bill No. 2441 authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, which I think would give rise to no discussion. I move to take the bill up at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is such a subdued and meek air all through the Senate, that I think we ought to have the reflection of our homes and boarding-houses, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not. If the Senator objects to the bill when it is read, I will consent to its going over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not move to adjourn on account of my objection to the bill by any means.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we might as well stay here an hour longer, at any rate. I would not have any bill passed with a meager Senate that anybody objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 18, nays 13; and (at twelve o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 12, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The CLERK. The Speaker of the House being absent, and the time for which a Speaker pro tempore was chosen for the House having expired, the Clerk, in conformity with the rules and usages of the House, now requests that the House will be in order while the Chaplain proceeds with prayer.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

ELECTION OF A SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The CLERK. The House is now in session, and, if there be no objection, it will be held that the first business in order is the election of a Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the following resolution, and ask its adoption:

Resolved, That Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, a Representative from the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and Mr. COX assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The journal of Tuesday last was read and approved.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the following resolution in regard to the organization of the House:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the President of the United States that Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, has been appointed Speaker pro tempore during the present temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has appointed Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, a Representative in the House from the State of New York, as Speaker pro tempore during the present absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] to strike out all after the word dollars, in line 37, down to the end of the paragraph, as follows: "Provided, That hereafter the free-delivery system shall not be established in cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants, and may be continued only in cities of not less than 40,000 inhabitants where now established by law;" to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CUTLER] offered an amendment to strike out all of the section after the word "inhabitants," in line 39, as follows: "Where now established by law."

Mr. CLYMER. I trust that the gentleman from Indiana, the member of the Committee on Appropriations who has charge of this bill, will consent that the proviso be stricken out. I think he must be convinced by this time that a large majority of the committee are in favor of striking it out. It will save time of the committee, and I think will subserve the purposes of the Government if he will agree to that course. I know that a great many gentlemen who are absent to-day would vote for the motion to strike out, and I feel quite certain that he will be acting in accordance with what he must deem to be the views of the majority of the committee by consenting to strike out that proviso without further discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. Not the whole proviso.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say but a single word as to the effect of the amendment. I hope that neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] nor any other gentleman on this floor will insist on striking out the entire proviso. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that if they will examine carefully the report of the Postmaster-General, they will find that the three cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston are self-sustaining so far as the free-delivery system is concerned; that the revenues of the United States in those cities are in excess of the cost of the free-delivery system to the amount of $681,308.90; and that coupling these offices with all the other cities with which there is a free delivery, eighty-seven in number, there is an apparent profit to the revenue of $67,517.55. Deduct that amount from the excess of the revenues in the three cities I have named, and it will leave the cost of the free-delivery system to the entire country $613,791.38. Gentlemen therefore must see that in making the change proposed to the extent of striking out the whole provisio the deficit of the Post-Office Department will be increased nearly $613,000, not quite that amount but very nearly so, and very largely in excess of half a million of dollars. Our friends ought to bear in mind that this is for the benefit of comparatively few localities at the expense of the entire country.

In view, however, of the general anxiety on the part of members, that the free-delivering system may continue in the cities where it is now established, although some of them have a population not exceeding 14,000, and from which very inconsiderable revenue is derived and which are a source of very heavy expenditure, I feel authorized to say that the Committee on Appropriations, while in favor of the proviso just as it stands, would concur in the views expressed by gentlemen to strike from the bill the last clause of the proviso: "And may be continued only in cities of not less than 40,000 inhabitants where now established by law." I hope that will be entirely satisfactory to this Committee of the Whole, and that the remainder of the proviso will be left so that hereafter, in the progress of time, something like uniformity may be established, and comparatively small cities shall not possess the privilege, which is not common to the great body of the people of this country, of having the mails delivered at their residences.

I think the present system is exceedingly inequitable and unjust, and it will be cured in part by leaving the proviso as I have suggested. I therefore trust that this committee will adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER,] which as I understand is to strike out the words "and may be continued only in cities of not less than forty thousand inhabitants where now established by law." I trust that amendment will be adopted and then the amendment as amended be agreed to.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I understand that of the thirty-two cities in which the free-delivery system is retained under this bill three are paying cities; that is, in three of them the local postage exceeds the expense of the free-delivery system by some six hundred and odd thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Three of them; Boston, New York, and Philadelphia.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. What is the total deficiency in the cities which will be deprived of the free-delivery system upon the basis of 40,000 population?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is stated, in the very hasty statement furnished to the committee by the Post-Office Department, that the deficiency will be $103,000.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Then I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this; and I do it simply for the purpose of showing that population is not the true test: In the twenty-nine cities retained, aside from the three paying cities, there is a deficiency of $547,000 and in the fifty-five cities stricken out under this provision there is a deficiency of only $103,000. It does not follow, therefore, that a population of 40,000 is a correct basis. In other words, the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia are paying about $500,000 in round numbers to defray the expense of the free-delivery system in the twenty-nine cities retained under the provision of this bill. Therefore the basis of 40,000 inhabitants does not seem to be the true test at all. It appears by the report of the Postmaster-General that the whole system is a paying system, and during the last year the increase in the revenues was 21 per cent., while the increase of expenditures was only 4 per cent. Therefore, I think the whole proposition is entirely in the wrong direction.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is mistaken even as to that; the whole system is not a paying system; on the contrary, the reverse is positively true. The Post-Office Department under this system loses a vast revenue in the shape of box-rents, which is not taken into account by the Postmaster-General in determining the amount of the deficit; that is the trouble. Take the box-rents into account, and the loss to the Post-Office Department is immensely beyond the amount stated in the report of the Postmaster-General. I trust my friend will see that this free-delivery system must stop somewhere. Generally the loss is in proportion to the sparseness of the population. Where the population is small the revenues are slight and the expense very material. The loss in each city is at least several thousand dollars. I trust there will be no objection to adopting the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER,] and leaving the first part of the proviso to stand.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I have no objections to the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. HOLMAN] if I understood him correctly to say that the Committee on Appropriations agreed to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER?]

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say that; I said I thought that the Committee on Appropriations would consent to that amendment. The committee are unanimously of the opinion that this paragraph should be adopted as it stands; that this free-delivery system is one serious source of deficit in the Post-Office Department. The Committee on Appropriations are unanimously in favor of the provision as it stands in the bill. I undertook to guard my words by saying that the Committee on Appropriations would consent to the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER,] leaving the rest of the proviso to stand.

Mr. FOSTER. For one, I do not concur. I cannot see any propriety in leaving it in a city with less than 40,000 people and hereafter refusing the same facility to cities of the same population; and for one, as a member of the committee, I object to any change of the clause.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to say to the gentleman from Ohio that in his absence the committee hastily considered this subject, and, in view of the anxiety on the part of many gentlemen as expressed on the floor to omit these words, we are now inclined to give it concurrence rather than the section should otherwise be in any important degree changed. There is no question, sir, so far as the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, for they are unanimously of the opinion this section should stand just as it is, and they only yield in view of the general sentiment on the part of members of the House.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I should like to ask my colleague what propriety there is in allowing cities with a population of less than 40,000 to retain the free-delivery system, while other cities in the future with a population of less than 40,000 will not be entitled to it. It seems to me as though the whole thing is wrong. If we are to adopt any rule, the population should be fixed beyond 40,000 to entitle a city or town to the free-delivery system. I believe the population of a city or town ought to be much over 40,000 to be entitled to free delivery rather than to retain it in cities having that population.

Mr. HOLMAN. I agree with my colleague.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. It seems to me, as it now is, to be nothing more than a needless burden imposed upon the people.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say that the whole trouble results from the act of 1867, which fixes the population at 50,000, but allows the postmaster in special cases to extend the free-delivery system to other cities. Unhappily under the pressure of the moment he has extended the free-delivery system down to cities as low as 12,000. The same trouble exists in the present law. It provides a city shall not have the free-delivery system unless it has a population of 30,000. This inequality is unavoidable.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Further amendment is not now in order, as the pending amendment is in the second degree.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in control of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER.]

Mr. HALE. If it is a formal amendment, I hope it will be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a formal amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to withdraw his amendment, and I will renew it.

Mr. CUTLER. I withdraw the amendment on the condition the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. HALE. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey. I wish only to say that for one, and as a member of the Committee an Appropriations, I regret the gentleman from Indiana has in any way lowered his standard. The Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Chairman, is engaged in the work of reducing expenditures. That has been its claim, that has been its labor; and some of us have sustained it pretty constantly on this side of the House.

The things we can cut off, Mr. Chairman, are luxuries and not necessities, and in the work the committee is engaged in, as the gentleman from Indiana well knows, it runs across many gentlemen's tracks, it treads on many people's corns. It is a work when entered upon the committee must have assumed would meet with combinations against its work in the House. It has met such a thing here. The committee reported upon this matter of carrier delivery a general, sweeping proposition that above 40,000 population towns and cities in the country should be allowed this luxury of carrier delivery; but it is a luxury which the rest of us pay for, and that is all there is about it. Most of us gentlemen who live in places smaller than 40,000, smaller than 30,000, smaller than 20,000, but all the time paying taxes, get no carrier delivery. We get no such convenience. We go to our post-offices and take out our mails. In the mean time, while doing that, we are paying the bills for the carrier system in cities above 40,000, or whatever figure they agree to. That being true, it was a certain and predetermined thing when the committee inaugurated this method, this plan of economy, running on the scale to 40,000, and applying to the future as well as to the present and past, all cities of 40,000 would combine against it here upon this floor. I did hope my friend from Indiana, battle-scarred as he is in this work of economy and in fighting his bills through, would not yield to any combination of this kind. If there is anything which the committee have reported that is a measure of fair economy in the interest of the people it is that this luxury of the carrier system which we pay for should not be applied to small cities and towns. I do not believe for one, sir, it ought to be applied anywhere except in cities so large that a single delivery would be clogged. I do not think that would apply in any city less than 100,000, to say nothing of 50,000 or 40,000. When you get below that, you get something that is not a necessity in the operation of the postal system. You get then where the delivery would not be clogged. You and I and others and all the people are paying the bills for the benefit of all the cities and towns now allowed a carrier system of delivery.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to yield when these points are made against our post-office bill, we will yield when we come to public buildings, we will yield when we come to navy-yards, we will yield when we come to light-houses; we will have to yield as we did on rivers and harbors. And in the mean time, while we are going on and striking down poor clerks from $1,800 to $1,600, from $1,600 to $1,400, and from $1,400 to $1,200, and driving them out of employment and leaving them to starve, and saving a paltry thousand here and there, we let everything that may get through by a log-rolling operation receive our consent or at least our acquiescence. I do not believe that we ought to do that.

Mr. TARBOX. In respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] I would answer that a public convenience once enjoyed by the people ceases to be a luxury, and comes to take its place among the popular necessities. I understand the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is to consent to a modification of the proviso so that it shall not apply to the discontinuance of the carrier system in localities where it now exists, but to retain so much of the proviso as applies to the future establishment of the convenience in other cities under 40,000 population. So far as my constituency is concerned, the modification which the gentleman consents to will relieve from any grievance, but I am opposed to it, and in favor of the full measure of the amendment; that is, the striking out of the whole proviso; because I believe that these facilities should be extended as rapidly as is consistent with a liberal public policy of enlargement of postal facilities.

I wish to say here in respect to every proposition of this bill which operates to curtail the privileges and facilities now enjoyed by the people, and which stands in the way of the extension of those same privileges more broadly, that I am opposed to each and all. I doubt, sir, if this particular feature is a measure of retrenchment. In the instance of the city of my residence I am very sure it would not work economy in any considerable degree. The public expenditures in the maintenance of suitable postal facilities would be more by the substitution of the distribution at the post-office for present system of delivery by carriers. The withdrawal of the carriers involves larger expenditures for clerical service within the post-office. It involves more extensive post-office accommodations. It would involve in this instance the establishment of a branch office in a remote portion of the city. And when you come to strike the balance between what you save and what you lose, the balance, in my judgment, would fall on the side of loss. At any rate it is not a retrenchment which a frugal popular sentiment asks for. We should promote and not lop off the advantages of postal communication between different communities or within the several localities. And since this proposition of the bill contemplates the taking away of existing facilities and preventing their extension in due course, I am opposed to it altogether, and hope the entire proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey if the gentleman from Illinois will renew it.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as one of the Representatives of a city which this amendment does not affect, I feel that I can speak of it without any danger of being charged with log-rolling. I am opposed, sir, to any cutting down of the postal facilities of this country. I believe that this is a retrograde step, and one that the democratic party ought not to take. I can fully understand the complacency with which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] acknowledged that he as one of the Committee on Appropriations was in favor of this. I can imagine how he would feel when fifty-five cities of the United States would come up and charge upon the democracy the taking from them facilities like this.

In every country in the world postal facilities are progressive instead of retrograding. In other countries the telegraph has been attached to the post-office department. In England and in Germany a man goes to the post-office and for twenty-five cents he sends twenty words by telegraph from one end of the country to the other. Everywhere it is known that rapid communication of ideas is rapid advancement of trade. I confess I dislike to oppose the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] but he has fallen into an error that every man has fallen into that pursues a single idea. The line that he has got upon has become a groove; the groove is working itself into a rut; the gentleman has fallen into a gorge as deep as the cañons of Colorado, and into which the sunlight can only reach when at its meridianal height.

Retrenchment and economy are not one and the same thing. True, economy is always retrenchment, but retrenchment may be destructive of true economy. They tell us that the postal service should be made to pay its way. Does the Education Department return anything to the Government? Are we receiving anything from the Education Department other than the benefit of the whole country? Sir, the postal arrangements of this country are worth all the education departments of the country.

Are we receiving any direct return from the Agricultural Department, in connection with which $700,000 to $1,000,000 are paid for the benefit of the farmers? No, sir; we receive a return in the indirect benefit that comes to them, and the city Representative as well as the country Representative is in favor of that expenditure.

The facilities that are given in a large city are facilities to the country. The citizen of Chicago in his facilities of getting mails is giving facilities to his correspondent in the country. The cities of 40,000 population are but the middle-men, the go-betweens, between the people of the country and the rest of the world. Their letter-carrier system is a benefit not to themselves but to their country correspondents. They receive letters and they transmit intelligence to different parts of the country. What for? Why to aid the people who stand back of the plow and are sending their products in. I am opposed to every retrograde movement. I believe that the post-office service is an educational service and you should not go back on it.

Sir, I can well imagine that the fifty-five cities that have been receiving the free-carrier service for a number of years, the thirty or forty thousand inhabitants of those cities cut off from that service, charging it upon the "ex-confederate House" that they are cutting down their rights and cutting down their facilities. Gentlemen, I say to you that no man in the democratic party can afford to take any such position as this. Let us go on and economize; let us make the Postmaster-General make his contracts of the best character and on the best terms, but let us not cut off this service. Let us allow this service to go on, and in the long run it will be a benefit to the people.

I have conversed with men in the different post-offices of the country, and the information I have is that the free-carrier system is adding to the postal facilities to such an extent that instead of being a charge it is becoming a profit to the country. Gentlemen think it is not a profit because the one cent extra does not pay the increased cost, but thousands upon thousands of letters are written at three cents simply because it is known that they will be delivered under the free-carrier system.

Mr. REAGAN. In the discussion upon this question a few days ago, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in expressing some views met a response from me, and a recurrence to that question may not be out of place at this time. The idea he then expressed was that the postal service ought to pay its own way, and that the people of the whole country should not pay for the extra facilities which a portion of the country receive

My friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] has just said that this free delivery confers benefits upon the people, and that, as those benefits have been conferred upon them, we ought not to take them away, and he expressed the hope that democrats would not vote to do so. Now, sir, that sort of democracy that I have been taught is that the Government was instituted for the benefit of all alike at the expense of all alike; that democratic government is not for the purpose of conferring exclusive privileges on any one portion of the people at the expense of others; and that brings the question directly up. If there are democrats here who do not believe that this Government is for the common benefit and to be administered at the equal and common expense, if there are those here who believe that each citizen should be taxed according to the benefit he receives or the amount of protection he receives, he can manifest it by his vote on this amendment.

I have not examined this subject as the Committee on Appropriations have, but if there could be a postage imposed to meet the expenses of the free-delivery system, that would be right. It is undoubtedly a convenience, but it is a convenience at expense of other persons. Free clothing would be a convenience for those who receive it, but not for those who have to pay for it. Free food would be convenient to those who consumed it, but not to those who had to foot the bills. Free anything else would be convenient to the recipients, but not advantageous to those who have to pay for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that it would require an additional tax of one cent per letter to make the free-delivery system pay?

Mr. REAGAN. I was coming to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. So I supposed. It would require nearly an additional cent to make the system self-sustaining.

Mr. REAGAN. For my own part I would give this free-delivery system to any place where they would pay the tax, and I would refuse it to any community where it required that the cost should be paid out of the revenues of the Government. I do not think that we shall ever do right until we make the revenue derivable from the postal service meet the expenditures of that service. I think this proposition recommended by the Committee on Appropriations is a step in the right direction, and I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it is right to sustain the report of the committee as it is whether it is popular or not. It takes from people privileges which they now enjoy at the expense of others, and I am opposed equally to the amendment which proposes to leave the free delivery with cities of a certain size.

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the gentleman if he does not know that the revenue derived from the postal service in the State of Texas is $100,000 behind the amount required for the service?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PAGE. Is a motion to strike out the last word in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. There are two amendments pending, and the amendment to the amendment is under the control of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CUTLER.]

Mr. CUTLER. I will withdraw the amendment so as to allow my colleague [Mr. HARDENBERGH] to renew it.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, when I came to the House this morning it was scarcely expected that the pending bill would thus early have been brought to the attention of the House, and having important duties on a committee I had omitted to bring with me some figures which I had obtained on this subject from the Post-Office Department, and they are now unfortunately at my room.

I hold in my hand, sir, a set of resolutions passed unanimously by the common council of Hoboken and approved by its mayor upon the subject of free delivery and remonstrating with earnestness that it be not interfered with.

Were my time not so limited and opportunity afforded me to speak as I could wish for my constituents of Hoboken, I could do no better than recite to you the very able remarks in his defense of the city of Lynn, made by the honored gentleman from Massachusetts, for they apply with equal strength to Hoboken and to her people. Sir, we shall be doing ourselves and the people an irreparable injury by denying to them by the terms of this bill the postal facilities of a free delivery already accorded to them. It is a city standing at the gates of commerce, with a population of 22,000—a loyal, industrious, and generous people.

The figures which I had obtained upon this subject proved that the united population of these fifty-five cities whose privileges of free delivery it is proposed to cut off are served at a much less expense when compared with New York and Philadelphia, whose united population aggregates the same figures.

The people, sir, have become accustomed to these facilities and they have a right to expect their continuance, and we must take no steps backward upon this question of free delivery. It is said that the people to whom these facilities are now extended should sustain the cost of free delivery.

Why should you require this one branch shall be self-sustaining? Are we to cut off the facilities in every department where not actually sustaining? Sir, it is from cities like Hoboken and Jersey City, the latter of which yields to the Department an annual revenue of over $30,000, that you derive the resources necessary to carry your mails along thousands of miles at the South and the West, where the revenue derived is entirely inadequate to their support. We must be generous; we must be liberal in our views of public policy. It is simple retrenchment without reform that seeks by bills such as this to deny the facilities of a free delivery, and they cry out against it, and implore you by their resolutions of public record to take no step backward, while they will cheerfully follow you in all your efforts to correct the abuses of government. Her population are active, busy, and industrious. It is the seat of commerce and of manufactures. Important lines of railroads have their terminus there connecting the great West with the ocean, and at her docks transatlantic steamers receive and discharge their cargoes of untold wealth. She looks forward to a career of honorable prosperity and of annual increase, and has a right to ask that you give recognition to the efforts of her people, and that in the interests of a true economy, as a tribute due to toil, you secure for her through the coming years the facilities of free postal delivery. I ask for my constituents that the amendment may prevail.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the committee for a moment in reply to the position taken by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in regard to the equities and justice of the taxation of the people to maintain a free-delivery system upon the basis now established by law. I believe that when this system of letter-carriers was first adopted in 1864, it was adopted because it was believed by the then Postmaster-General of the United States that cities with a population of 12,000 inhabitants were entitled to some additional postal facilities. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says that towns in thinly inhabited sections have to contribute for the letter-carrier system in cities of 40,000 inhabitants. He never was more mistaken in a mathematical proposition in his entire life. The facts are the other way. It is not a fact, as was stated the other day, that cities of over 40,000 inhabitants produce the greatest revenue aside from Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; but the fact does appear that twenty-nine cities with a population of over 40,000 inhabitants require over $500,000 from those cities to support their letter-carrier system, while the fifty-five cities stricken out under this provision in the bill require only $102,000, or thereabout. But let us carry the matter a little further. Let us take the State of Ohio for an illustration. There are thirty-seven towns in the State of Ohio in which the post-offices do not pay 50 per cent. of the entire revenue of the Government, while there are eighty cities where the letter-carrier system prevails which pay 56 per cent. of the entire revenue. I wish to call attention to the fact that the little city of Brooklyn, whose representative [Mr. CHITTENDEN] I see is about to speak, costs 84 per cent. to pay for its carrier system and post-office expenses, and that the city of Washington costs 88 per cent. of the revenues derived there. In the city of Albany the cost of the free-delivery system and post-office expense is 54 per cent. of the entire revenue of the post-office in that city. In Allegheny City which, under this bill would retain the free-delivery system, the cost of the local service is 67 per cent. of the revenues, while the cost in all the cities now possessing the system is only 44 per cent. of the postal revenues from those cities.

Why should we adopt the basis of 40,000 population as the rule for this free-delivery system? Why not leave the law as it now stands? The Postmaster-General in his report shows that the local postage is enough to maintain the local business. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says that he is not in favor of taking from one city and giving to another. There is a city of 30,000 inhabitants in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor, and the expense of this free-delivery system and post-office expense in that city is but 44 per cent. of its revenues; in other words its letter-carrier system and post-office expenses are but 44 per cent. of its revenues; yet in the city of Brooklyn the letter-carrier system and post-office expenses are 84 per cent. of its revenues. There is no justice whatever in this proviso of the bill. Why not leave the law as it stands, so long as it is doing so well for the country? Why take away any of the privileges to which the people have become accustomed and habituated in all their business relations; why take away any of these privileges under the plea of retrenchment, when the proposition has practically no retrenchment in it?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment in order to allow my colleague, [Mr. CUTLER,] who originally moved it, to renew it.

Mr. CUTLER. I renew the amendment, and will be willing to have debate closed upon it after I have said a few words. There is no Department of the Government in which the people have so great an interest as that of the Post-Office Department. There is no hearthstone in our land, not a man, woman, or child who is not interested in it. I regret exceedingly that any attempt should be made in this Congress to abridge or to curtail the advantages of the free-delivery system now enjoyed by the people. It will be met not only by the severe condemnation of the people of this country but by their severe rebuke.

I represent a district in which there is a city of about 39,000 inhabitants, the city of Paterson, a manufacturing city of 39,200 inhabitants. The adoption of this proviso would deprive that city of the benefits of this free-delivery system; it would be a direct blow to its interests and prosperity and a hardship upon her people. In but few States is the Post-Office Department self sustaining, I believe in but six, and my State is one. This attempt at retrenchment and reform, if it be such, I think comes at a bad time. I desire to call the attention of members to the admirable report of the Postmaster-General for 1875, to show that the free-delivery system in this country for the last fiscal year was a paying system. Prior to that time it had been a source of loss to the Government. The Postmaster-General says:

> No additions have been made during the year to the number of free-delivery offices. The service was, however, extended in five large cities by discontinuing the smaller offices in and adjacent to them, substituting branch offices, and extending the carriers' delivery, in accordance with the policy announced in my last report.
> The general results of the service show a most gratifying exhibit and clearly indicate its usefulness and popularity. For the first time since its establishment the aggregate postage on local matter exceeded the total expense. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1874, the deficiency of local postage to meet the expenses was $191,214.75. This year the excess of postage over the expense was $67,517.55. The increase in the cost of service was 4 per cent. The increase in the postage on local matter was 21 per cent.

I was glad to hear the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. HOLMAN,] say they would accept the amendment I have offered, so that the privileges of the free-delivery system may not be impaired in any city where it now exists, and especially at this time, when it has become a paying system.

There is no tax the people will more gladly pay than that tax which brings knowledge and intelligence to their homes.

I trust the free-delivery system will not be abolished in cities where it now exists.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to add but a remark or two in this regard, and then I trust this committee will consent to close debate on this paragraph.

I was somewhat guarded in my remark in reference to the action of the Committee on Appropriations upon the pending amendments, the one proposing to strike out the whole proviso and the other to strike out only the last clause of it. I did so for the reason that the Committee on Appropriations, as was so well stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] are and have been, ever since we have examined this subject, unanimously of the opinion that this provision of the bill as it now stands ought to become the law of the land. But there is naturally quite an anxiety on the part of the Committee on Appropriations that all of the beneficial reforms they propose should not be lost by declining to yield anything at all. It was for that reason that, speaking for myself rather than for the committee, I said I was inclined to acquiesce in the proposition to strike out the latter part of the proviso. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. CUTLER] has misapprehended me; I suggested that only as a fair concession, in a spirit of compromise. I believe in the provision of the bill just as it now stands. I do not think that any gentleman, when he comes to consider the matter, can claim for his constituents rights which must inevitably be withheld from the great body of the people of the country, who must bear the burden resulting from this system in common with those who alone reap its benefits.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Then why not take the free-delivery system away from all the cities that now have it?

Mr. HOLMAN. For the simple reason that where there is a large population, say 50,000, which was the standard fixed in 18.7, the people do not so conveniently and readily obtain access to the room provided for the post-office, and to the post-office boxes, as they do in smaller places. For that reason and that only is this free-delivery system justifiable in any portion of the country, unless it may be made a common right pertaining to all the people of this country.

I wish to call attention for a moment to the towns which have been mentioned here by gentlemen who are speaking in behalf of this free delivery system. I will take but a few instances. Take Paterson, New Jersey, the town of my friend, [Mr. CUTLER.] There the expenses of this free-delivery system to the people of the country are $5,101 67, while the whole revenue resulting from th payment of two cents on every free-delivered letter amounts to only $1,483.33. Thus the whole people of the country are compelled to pay some $4,000 in order that the constituents of my friend may enjoy the privilege of having letters delivered at their doors.

Take Hoboken, New Jersey. There the revenues are but $638.08, while the expenses are $2,799.74. Thus it is all along the line. The truth is that this $8,100,000 of deficiency, which is a burden upon the whole people, is largely made up of this class of exclusive benefits, benefits conferred upon a portion of the people at the expense of all the rest.

I believe that there is just as much opposition to the residue of this proviso as to the portion that is covered by the last motion; and if the fight must be over the whole, if every attempt at retrenchment here must cease, then the Committee on Appropriations owe it to the House and to the country to stand by their original proposition.

One word in addition, and I trust gentlemen will not forget it. The only bill passed by the House at this session that has been the subject very generally of severe criticism is a measure that appealed to local interests. I refer to the river and harbor bill. That, the only measure adopted by this House which has been (to use the mildest term) universally censured, and which was carried through this House by a two-thirds vote on a motion to suspend the rules, appealed to local interests everywhere; yet the people at home, when they come to consider it, are not so mindful of local interests as we seem to be here; for very generally, from Maine to California, the action of the House upon that question has been condemned. I trust we shall not repeat the same error on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I rise to a point of order. I make the point that if the amendment to the amendment, as moved by the gentleman from New Jersey, prevails, it necessarily takes out the whole proviso, which is my amendment; and the reason for it is this: If the amendment to the amendment prevails, it strikes out that portion of the paragraph which retrenches expenditures, allowing that portion to stand which does not retrench expenditures. Hence, under the ruling of the Chair as made last Saturday, the entire paragraph must necessarily go out.

Mr. HOLMAN. That point comes rather late.

Mr. MUTCHLER. The Chair ruled on Saturday last that a point which I then rased was not well taken, because this proposition to abolish the letter-carrier system in cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants necessarily abolished offices; hence, if the amendment to the amendment prevails, it strikes out that portion of the paragraph abolishing offices, and necessarily strikes out the entire proviso, which is my amendment. I ask for the ruling of the Chair on this point.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to say a word upon the point of order. This entire proviso has come in under the decision of the Chairman, and surely, after it is once in, it is competent for the Committee of the Whole to change it in whatever manner they may deem fit. I do not see that there is any ground for the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a measure of retrenchment, even if the last words be stricken out; but even if it were not so, it must be clear to the Chair that when a proposition germane to the bill and retrenching expenses has come in, no change which may be made in the proposition can again subject it to the point of order.

Mr. BANKS. I would like to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the question of order?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BANKS. Well, I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow us to have a little further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MUTCHLER.]

Mr. BANKS. In regard to the point of order I think the gentleman from Indiana is correct. After a proposition has been admitted as a matter of right, it must of course be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, having already decided that this proviso as an entirety, being germane and retrenching expenses, is in order under Rule 120, overrules the point of order now raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that a portion of it is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the debate in Committee of the Whole on this paragraph be limited by unanimous consent to ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate can now be continued upon this amendment by unanimous consent only.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman make his proposition applicable to this clause in whatever form it may assume?

Mr. HOLMAN. My proposition applies to the entire paragraph in regard to the free-delivery system.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better modify his proposition; for he can well see that after a vote has been taken upon this proposition it may be left in such a condition with other amendments which would be germane that gentlemen may want to debate it a little while longer. I suggest to the gentleman to confine his proposition to this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will then confine it to the amendment to strike out all after the word "inhabitants" and the amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that no amendment is now in order to this amendment. Therefore it can only be further debated by the gentleman from New Jersey withdrawing his amendment and that amendment being renewed by another member. If the gentleman from New Jersey refuses to withdraw his amendment, then the question must be now taken without further debate.

Mr. HALE. Then further debate on the pending amendment can only take place by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Does the gentleman from New Jersey insist on a vote on his amendment?

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will withdraw his amendment, and I will renew it.

Mr. CUTLER. I will withdraw it on condition the gentleman from Massachusetts will renew it and that debate shall then not extend beyond ten minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey. My constituents are deeply interested in this question. It is a population particularly dependent upon the mails for communication with relatives and friends, merchants, manufacturers, buyers, and consumers in other portions of the country.

Their capacity, industry, and prosperity, the peace of their homes and the success of their multifarious pursuits greatly depend upon communication with the outside world. It must be frequent, constant, and certain. It is a primal necessity of society, industry, and trade. For this they depend upon the postal service, and they cheerfully pay whatever it costs. It is the system the Government has established for this duty. It is Government monopoly and necessity, and no other party or power is permitted to interfere with it.

The post-office, Mr. Chairman, is a Government institution. It holds the country together. The Government could not carry on its business nor maintain its authority or its institutions unless it had some means of special and general communication with its agents and the people at the most distant parts of the Republic, and the mails offer the best means for that purpose.

It is useless to say the mails should be carried only where they are carried at a profit, where they pay their cost, because the necessities of the Government require some means of communication, just as much as it does the exercise of some other powers. What should we say of a proposition made in this House that the Government should not defend its territory except where the people could pay the expense of a military force or maintain and pay an army for that purpose? What should we say of a proposition from the leaders of the House, and especially by gentlemen from the democratic side of the House, that no use of the Navy should be allowed except where the people are able to pay the cost of that service at the particular point where its use may be required? What would those gentlemen say who only a few days ago voted seven or eight million dollars, and would have been glad to have voted many millions more if they could have got a majority for it—what would they say if it were claimed in every instance where appropriations were solicited for custom-houses or other public buildings or improvements in rivers and harbors, that the particular locality where improvement was proposed to be made should pay the cost of it? Every man knows such a policy would be impossible. The administration of justice is of the same character. It cannot be neglected even if it does not pay its cost in money.

Sir, it does not belong to the Government to urge such reasons. If gentlemen are in opposition and do not want any government, then they are perfectly right in the position they have taken. But if they wish to support the Government and ultimately to assume its direction, they should understand there are certain powers which must be exercised, certain duties that must be performed, cost what they will, and the postal service is one of them.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a constituency which is in a great degree composed of working men and women, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and traders, who are employed one day with another ten or twelve hours, and very moderately paid. They cannot go or send, many of them, to the post-office for their letters. There is not a merchant, a corporation, a capitalist who cannot have letters brought to them by their own agents at a cost of not more than six or eight cents a day. And yet where there are twenty or thirty of these people in my district who can get their letters brought as cheaply as that, there are thousands and tens of thousands who cannot get their letters at all unless they go for them before beginning work in the morning, or in the evening after they have ceased to work.

Do gentlemen on the other side of the House mean to say they are going to deprive the working-people of the country of the facilities of the mail simply to carry out a principle which never was and never will be applied in any government on the face of the earth; that is, that everything which is done by the Government must be paid for by the particular locality where the particular thing happens to be required? Look at the railroads which are carrying travelers, the products of industry, and the elements of trade to and from every part of the country, from the ocean coasts east and west to the valley of the Mississippi. How much have the people of the West paid for those railroads? As a matter of general fact, not one dollar. What the Government has not done capitalists have done, and by that aid they have got now in their hands those means of communication which will give them now or hereafter, if wise and just, the absolute control of the Government without the cost of a dollar to the people of the particular localities where the roads are established.

Now, here is the subject of information, intelligence, communication, infinitely more important to the people of this country than any other topic which can be presented, without which no republic can long exist, without which no government can maintain its authority or power. They propose to take this away, not from all classes of the people, but from the common people, the working people, the people who have no other means of maintaining communication with each other. Do gentlemen of the democratic side mean to do this? How can they expect accessions to the democratic party if they set up such bars as that against the masses of the people? Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, and let me say to gentlemen of this House that it is the working people who finally pay all the costs of Government, of whatever character, for whatever purposes expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a single question before he takes his seat? Would he favor the extension of the free-delivery system to all towns where there are bodies of workingmen?

Mr. BANKS. Let me reply to the gentleman's question. It is a fair one. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would, just as soon as it could be wisely and profitably done, consistently with the general interests of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Down to towns of three or four thousand inhabitants?

Mr. BANKS. Everywhere; as soon—let the gentleman mark this—as it could be wisely and profitably done for the interest of the Government itself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can my friend intimate to the committee the number of millions of deficit that such a system would necessarily entail on the tax-payers of the country?

Mr. BANKS. Not to the extent of a dollar of taxation. I would not press any policy, whether relating to the post-office or any other, beyond that point which was reasonable in itself. I would not say that every man and woman should have a carrier to bring their letters to their doors. Not at all. But the principle being recognized, it ought to be extended as far and as rapidly as it could be with safety to the interests of the Government. We should build upon it, not overthrow it. And the Postmaster-General has told us that this is a paying principle. We should extend it as rapidly as may be consistent with other general interests of the Government, not cripple or destroy it. We might as well go back to the postage of twenty-five cents a letter on the ground that nothing less has ever paid as to cut off this free-delivery system. The Postmaster-General, who is in favor of a paying policy for his Department, tells us this will pay and is paying better than the old system of high rates and long-deferred mails.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Postmaster-General cannot say that the system has paid except in the three great cities of the country.

Mr. CHITTENDEN rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that by unanimous consent debate on the pending amendment shall close in ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] have advocated principles here in respect to the expenditures of the post-office which, if I have made no mistake, will surely lead in the near future, if carried out in practice, to a deficit of $50,000,000, or even $100,000,000 instead of $8,000,000 per annum.

I hold that the present practice of our Post-Office Department is the most demoralizing influence in the Government. If I have not made a very great error, no high public official has uttered a sentiment within the last ten years which met with so much popular approbation as the suggestion of the present Postmaster-General when he took his present position, that he would endeavor to make the Post-Office a self-supporting establishment. I know, sir, that we have gone the wrong road too long to make it a self-supporting establishment immediately. I cannot believe it possible wisely to cut down in one year as much as the Committee on Appropriations propose to cut down this year. But they are right in principle; and sooner or later, if we are to reform the wrong-doings of Government, we have to reform this.

In respect to this particular question the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] says that it is the business of the Government to carry the mails. I admit that; but it is not necessarily the business of the Government to deliver every letter and newspaper at the door of every inhabitant of the town the gentleman represents. That is a gratuity. There is scarcely a family in any village of twenty-five hundred people or in any town of twenty-five thousand people that have not children or servants to send to the post-office.

I do not see the force of the argument in favor of giving this free-delivery system to towns and places where it is not self-supporting. The free-delivery part of the postal system should, in my judgment, be self-supporting. Allusion has been made to the town in which I live. Well, sir, it is not the practice of gentlemen to stand here and claim anything less for the towns they represent than they receive; but I believe, and I say it without any regard to the reception the remark may receive at home, that this free-delivery system is carried to excess in the town where I live. I know no reason why letters should be delivered at my door five times a day. I think three times would do just as well. A delivery of letters and newspapers three times a day I think would be sufficient, and the expense would be less. I do not know whether the people of Brooklyn approve of my saying so or not, but I am ready to vote for retrenchment by reducing the delivery to three times a day instead of five times a day, be the consequences what they may.

My point is this, and I ask that it may be remembered: Unless we are to go entirely to the bad, the corruptions which now exist, and which are everywhere recognized as existing in every department of our Government, must be got rid of. We have to reform the Post-Office Department first of all. We have to look to that Department as the place where the employés are necessarily more demoralized and where the whole country is demoralized with them. Does not everybody see it? Is there a man here who has a family of children or a number of servants who would tell them to ask everything and he would give them everything without reference to revenue? Do we not all know that such a system would ruin individuals; and the people for whom the Post-Office Department exists are only men; and yet the Government say to them, "Ask and you shall receive; anything you demand we will give you." Such a system will certainly lead us to enormous extravagance.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] is opposed to the free-delivery system so far as it relates to the fifty-five cities which the committee propose to cut off from its benefits. At the same time he is in favor of keeping it so far as his own city of Brooklyn is concerned, but he is willing to put up with a delivery of three times a day.

Now let us examine the report of the Postmaster-General and see how much it costs the people to maintain the free-delivery system for the city of Brooklyn.

The aggregate cost is $79,320, while the total amount of local postage is only $57,007.84, a deficit of more than $22,000. Yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] is willing to maintain this system in Brooklyn where the cost is more than $22,000 in excess of the receipts on local postage in order that his constituents may be accommodated, but is anxious to take it from fifty-five cities where it is now established because they contain according to the census taken in 1870 a population of less than 40,000.

He tells us in the speech he has just made that the free-delivery part of the postal system should be self-supporting, and would be willing as far as Brooklyn, the city he represents, is concerned should have a delivery only three times per day. Ah! how generous, especially when we remember that there it is not only not self-supporting, but falls more than $22,000 behind.

Now if this system is wrong, why do not the Committee on Appropriations abolish it altogether? Why have it in the great cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and not have it in the cities where this committee propose to abolish it? Why change the law in regard to the small cities and let it remain as to the large ones? Why not treat all alike?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The office in New York returns a profit of $1,800,000 a year.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Now I say that if the system is wrong, it should not be tolerated by the country; cut it off from all or none. I do not intend so far as my vote is concerned to take one step backward, and not a vote of mine shall be given for any bill that will cripple the postal facilities of the country. No plausible reason can be given for changing the carrier system as it now stands. If we change, it should be in the line of progress. Following the logic of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who says that the people should not pay for these luxuries, that it is a tax upon them, why not go further and cut off the postal facilities from all the States where the postal service does not pay? He knows that it pays only in six States of the Union. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] would be in favor of that, because New York is one of those six States where the postal service pays its expenses. Now I am opposed to taking away any of the postal facilities from the people, or any of the conveniences heretofore enjoyed by them. I do not know but that as an original proposition I should have voted against extending these facilities to the cities, but after they have had them and enjoyed them, if this House seeks to take them from them it will not only deserve but will receive the censure of the one million two hundred and forty-five thousand inhabitants of those cities.

We should allow the law to stand as it does now. There is no demand for any change. The people do not require it, nor does economy call for it.

It has been clearly shown in the course of this debate that the system is not an expensive one and that it has greatly increased the postal revenues. The Postmaster-General in his last report highly commends the system, and says it is meeting with the "most gratifying results."

One word more. Can we who are in favor of retaining this free delivery where it has been established and where it is so justly popular—can we with any show of fairness, or right, or justice say that we will hereafter require a different standard of population before the same privilege shall be extended to other places?

I would scorn to vote for any proposition that is so manifestly unjust. Let the law remain unchanged.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed by the unanimous order of the committee.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order, there being two amendments already pending, and debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment.

The question was taken upon Mr. CUTLER'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. MUTCHLER, and on a division there were ayes 28, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. MUTCHLER'S amendment to strike out the proviso.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I presume that no further debate is desired on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by unanimous consent.

The question was taken on Mr. MUTCHLER'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 145, noes 29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has a quorum voted?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; 169 members have voted.

Mr. FOSTER. I now call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the necessity of increasing this appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have passed that item, and cannot go back.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman object to going back?

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to recur to that paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the appropriation is ample enough.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For letter-balances and scales, $3,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend that clause by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$7,000." And I desire to speak to the other proposition. It seems to me that my friend from Indiana should not now, since he has been beaten in the House—and I am sorry he was beaten, and it only illustrates the principle advanced by my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] that when we have log-rolling propositions we can get no economy from this House—it seems to me to be trifling with the majority of the House not to give them the full amount necessary to pay this expense. If we do not do it some other House will have to do it, and it will only result in deficiencies.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will result in no deficiency. There is great extravagance now in the postal-mail service, and under an efficient and honest administration of that Department large reductions have been made. There is no reason why certain of our people should have their mails brought to their firesides five times a day while a large majority of the people of the country have to travel miles and miles for their mail. There is no doubt about that.

There is no trouble about this matter. The appropriation here made is $1,650,000, and all that is necessary is for the Postmaster-General to act upon the same economical principle upon which he set out, and to deliver letters in the free-delivery cities only as frequently as the public service actually requires. I believe the amount here appropriated is amply sufficient for that purpose, and I am therefore opposed to increasing it.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the paragraph relating to the free-delivery system has been passed by the committee, and that this discussion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

For rent, light, and fuel, $390,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to insert after the paragraph just read the paragraph which I send to the clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional for letter-carrier system for cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants, $350,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the pending paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is it not germane?

Mr. HOLMAN. Because it does not apply to the same subject-matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. You had better not; we will beat you worse than before.

Mr. FOSTER. I insist upon my appeal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to restate his point of order and to give the ground of his appeal.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see why my amendment is not germane and in order. My amendment is to carry out the letter-carrier system, which is provided for in this portion of the bill; and unless this is done all cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants cannot be supplied with this free-delivery system.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill provides for a letter-carrier system in cities having more than 40,000 inhabitants. There was a clause in the bill that proposed to change the law so that for cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants there should be no letter-carrier system, but that clause has been stricken out. Therefore as the bill now stands the letter-carrier system will remain intact as it exists under the present law. My colleague [Mr. FOSTER] offers an amendment appropriating money to carry out the law which the Committee of the Whole has just voted it will not repeal. The existing law provides for establishing the letter-carrier system, and this portion of the bill proposes to leave that law as it stands. In the same portion of this bill we are making appropriations for sundry miscellaneous purposes, for wrapping-paper, for letter-balances and scales, for rent, light, fuel, &c. My colleague offers an amendment to appropriate $350,000 for delivering the letters free to the people from the very post-offices for which we are making these miscellaneous appropriations according to the law which we have just voted shall remain as it now stands. We are working upon the portion of the bill providing for miscellaneous expenses, and this amendment relates to the portion providing a letter-carrier system. If it is ruled out of order, then it is out of order to move an amendment making any appropriation for the Post-Office Department, which is provided by law in the portion of the bill relating to miscellaneous appropriations.

I think there can be no clearer case of a germane provision. This is not a list of clauses independent of each other, but all relating to miscellaneous expenditures, and my colleague proposes to add a clause making further appropriation for one of these miscellaneous expenditures. If he had offered an amendment relating to rivers and harbors, of course that would be ruled out of order. But he offers an amendment to cure a defect in a portion of the bill in which the House, by an overwhelming vote, has resolved not to change existing laws. If it is not germane, then it is not germane to have anything about post-offices in this portion of the bill. The same House that voted that this carrier system should not be destroyed (I agreed with the Committee on Appropriations myself, but we were voted down overwhelmingly) ought to sustain the amendment of my colleague, and ought to sustain him, if need be in overruling the decision of the Chair upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. An appeal from the decision of the Chair cannot be taken in the Committee of the Whole. In practice this has frequently been done; but the leading authorities on parliamentary law do not recognize this practice as regular. The better way to settle the question is for the committee to rise in order to report the point of order to the House, and ask its instruction in reference to the matter in question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will withdraw his appeal.

Mr. FOSTER. I will withdraw it if the gentleman will allow me to go back to the other clause and move my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. It can all be settled without trouble if the gentleman will allow the amendment to be offered to the other clause.

Mr. HOLMAN. I feel very confident that this letter-carrier system can be carried on at an expense not exceeding $1,650,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the gentleman is guilty of the absurdity of reporting an appropriation of $1,650,000 for carrying on the letter-carrier system in only fifty-five cities.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would appear to be a good answer, but it is not a good one for the reason that had the proviso not been stricken out, a motion would have been made to largely reduce this appropriation. If the gentleman insists upon his appeal, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. FOSTER. I insist upon my appeal, of course.

The question was taken upon the motion that the committee rise; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see any other mode of procedure, except for the committee to rise, with this point of order pending.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the Committee of the Whole have already passed upon the paragraph relating to the letter-carrier system.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. RANDALL. And that is right; otherwise we might forever amend by going back in this way. One of our rules is that we shall not go back.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. It is upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the committee rise for the purpose of submitting this question of order to the House.

The question being again taken, the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair,

Mr. SPRINGER (chairman of the Committee of the Whole) said: The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill, have directed me to report that they have made some progress thereon, but that a point of order arose with respect to an amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to the forty-sixth line, and that point being decided by the Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio desires to report the point of order to the House and to obtain the direction of the House in reference thereto.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question raised in Committee of the Whole having now been reported, being upon an appeal from the decision of the Chairman, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I raise the point of order that the question has not been stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to state it.

Mr. HOAR. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, as was his right, authorized the gentleman from Ohio to state his point to the House as part of the report of the Committee of the Whole; and he is entitled to do so before the question is taken upon the appeal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the practice to be this: The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole reports to the House the question raised in the Committee of the Whole; and it then stands here just as though the appeal had been made from the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point that the amendment should be reported to the House before further debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to order that the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole be read. The point of order will then be stated by the gentleman who raised it in Committee of the Whole, so that it can be made a matter of record; and then the Chair will rule upon it.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. FOSTER, as follows:

Add after line 47 the following:
For additional for letter-carrier system, $350,000, for cities of less than 40,000 inhabitants.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the facts to be these: The paragraph pending in Committee of the Whole was the following:

For rent, light, and fuel, $390,000.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] moved, as an amendment to this proposition, to appropriate for letter-carriers $350,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the end of that, as an additional paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moved to add at the end of the paragraph the words "for letter-carriers, $350,000." Now that must be an amendment of course to the printed text. The point of order was made that that was not germane, and the point was sustained by the Chair. On that an appeal was taken, and that appeal now comes before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the custom which prevails in the Committee of the Whole, and inasmuch as the clause from line 36 to line 41 pertains to letter-carriers, the Chair rules that it is out of order to go back either directly or indirectly to take up that matter again. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order and rules out the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the Chair whether that ruling would cover the same proposition if offered at the end of the bill as a new section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule on that question when it comes properly before him.

Mr. FOSTER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL, there were—ayes 76, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FOSTER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 64.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation, $14,500,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to amend so as to make this paragraph read as follows:

For transportation by railroad, $8,862,149; for transportation on star routes and by steamboats and on all other than railroad routes, $6,237,851; in all, $15,100,000.

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by this amendment, which I submit by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, that it is proposed to increase this appropriation for inland transportation to the amount of $600,000. The effect of the proposition is to somewhat increase the appropriation for star routes and to diminish somewhat from the appropriation for the present fiscal year the appropriation for railroad transportation.

I wish to call the attention of the House to two facts in regard to star routes. Last fiscal year the whole amount of the star routes and steamboat expenditure, which covered the whole of inland transportation besides railroad transportation, was $6,137,851. It is proposed to increase the appropriation for that purpose, that is, for steamboat and star routes, $100,000 over the expenditure for the last year.

And in that connection I wish to call the attention of the committee to the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General bearing date April 26, 1876, from which it appears that during the present fiscal year, based on returns for three quarters and an estimate for the remaining quarter, the increase in steamboat service will be $21,974, while the decrease in what is known as the star-route service will be $41,745, making a reduction on the expenditures of last year for steamboat and star-route service of a little rising $19,000. This has resulted from more favorable contracts which were made last year and during this year up to the present time for transportation of mails for these two modes of service.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in his report to the Postmaster-General for the last fiscal year presents this state of things, that there was an increase in the number of miles of postal service for the last year of 8,776, while there was a decrease of expenditures therefor of $48,688, showing the cost last year was a little greater than it will be for the present year. In both those branches of service, the steamboat and star route, there was last year and will be this an actual reduction on the cost last year based on the preceding year and the present year based on last year. But to avoid the possibility of mistakes in this respect, inasmuch as these star routes are of the highest importance to the country, the committee has recommended an increase of that appropriation to the extent of $100,000, making the entire appropriation for star routes and steamboat service $6,237,851 as against an expenditure of $6,137,851 for last year and still less expenditure for the present fiscal year based on returns for three quarters already received at the Post-Office Department. It is believed by the Committee on Appropriations this adjustment of expenditure for inland transportation to the amount proposed to be appropriated for the different branches of that service will be found to be amply sufficient.

I trust the committee will bear with me in mentioning another fact. The committee fixed the rates of compensation to railroad companies at 6 mills per linear foot of car space for a speed up to 25 miles per hour—not exceeding 25 miles per hour—and 7 mills per linear foot of car space for a speed exceeding 25 miles per hour. The subject has been further investigated by the committee, and they propose to modify those figures, and to fix as compensation to railroad companies 5 mills per linear foot of car space for a speed up to 25 miles per hour, and 6 mills per linear foot of car space for a speed exceeding 25 miles per hour. It is believed by some of the members of the committee, although the subject has not been discussed so that an opinion has been expressed by the members of the committee, that these sums will be ample and sufficient to secure the transportation of the mails by railroads, and the cost to the Government will perhaps fall considerably under the appropriation now proposed to be made. I believe that is all I wish to submit at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announcing the passage of the bill (S. No. 695) for the relief of Angeline Logan; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman from Illinois begins his remarks, I wish to ask a question of the Chair. I offered two amendments to this section when the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole for the first time. Are those two amendments now pending to be considered before other amendments, or have I to again offer them for action?

The CHAIRMAN. The recollection of the Chair is that the amendments referred to by the gentleman were read in committee for information, to be offered at the proper time.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know what the understanding was, but I ask to offer the amendments now if the understanding was that they were not submitted when they were read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise now to prevent myself from being cut off when I shall offer an amendment for an increased appropriation which will be necessary to support the fast mail. If the ruling of the Chair shall be continued that we shall not go back, that may be cut off entirely. I now offer an amendment to increase the amount for railroad transportation by $390,000.

I will state my reason for offering this amendment. I have information that it will be impossible for the railroads to transport the mails over thirty miles an hour at 6 mills per foot—the figure at which the gentleman from Indiana proposes to fix it. It is even impossible to get the transportation at 7 mills.

The gentleman from Indiana thinks that the people of the United States are willing to go back to the old stage-coach lines and take days and days for the transportation of our postal matter. The gentleman says it does not make so much difference whether we receive our letters a few hours sooner or a few hours later. Sir, a few weeks ago I was looking over some old correspondence of my father and my grandfather. My grandfather thanked my father, his son, for writing once in three months from college. When I was myself absent from home at school my mother charged me to be certain to write to her once a month. But, sir, a father or mother to-day whose son is absent will demand that he shall write twice a week or every day. Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis—times changing, we change. The days of old stage-coaching are done away with. The gentleman from Indiana may be satisfied with them, but out in the West and in the North we are not.

It has been said that every locality shall support its own postal facilities. Now, sir, the fast mail, running from New York and Boston to Chicago, passes through the States of Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois. Those six States pay one-half of all that the Government receives from the postal service. These six States pay $12,703,000; all the others pay $12,956,000. The six States pay the Government one-half of the entire expenses of the postal service, and, sir, what does it cost the Government for transportation in these six States? The whole cost of the transportation of the mails in the United States is $31,057,000, and the cost of the transportation in the six States is $12,645,000, only two-fifths of the whole. It costs the Government for these six States two-fifths of the entire cost of transportation, and they pay the Government one-half of what the Government receives from the postal service. Are we, sir, to be cut off, then, from our rapid facilities when we are supporting them? Gentlemen say that this is for the benefit of Chicago and of New York. Sir, Chicago has no benefit that does not accrue to the entire Northwest. To-day Chicago is the second post-office in America for letter transportation. Chicago is ahead of New York for newspaper transportation, and why? Because, sir, it is the distributing-point for twenty millions of people. This fast-mail line distributes mail matter to very nearly one-half of the entire population of America; as I have stated, to twenty millions of people, it is believed—Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, all Illinois, Missouri, and the great West to the Pacific Ocean, to say nothing of this grand acquisition we made the other day of the Hawaiian Islands. Chicago sends their mails to them and returns their mails back to the whole of the East. Why is it? It is because the railroad communications running toward the West have enabled them to send the mail one day ahead of the old speed that was given us before.

I have said that I am opposed to any going back in this measure. In England they give rapid facilities, and the letters are carried to every man's door, not only in towns, but even in the country. We want to receive the mails from the East at Chicago with rapidity, and thus the villages of Saint Louis, of Saint Paul, and of San Francisco will get the benefit of it. Saint Louis is rather opposed to this fast-mail line. Why, sir, Saint Louis had dropped into a Rip Van Winkle sleep, and would not have waked up for a hundred years, until from Chicago we dug a ditch, and sent a little Chicago River water into the Mississippi, and Saint Louis then waked up, built a bridge, and this year she will elect you a democratic President. [Laughter.] And why, sir? Simply because of her connection with Chicago.

I am opposed, sir, to any striking down of the mail facilities, and I therefore hope the amendment will be sustained.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I observe that there is a reduction in the appropriation in this item of $3,048,000, and I have an amendment to offer. This reduction of the committee is for a branch of the service that is constantly increasing, for carrying the mails. We have in the West and Southwest an increase of many thousand post-offices and post-routes every year. The committee propose to cripple this branch of the service, which furnishes the rapidly-developing parts of the country necessary postal service.

I must, here, Mr. Chairman, protest against the doctrine of the gentleman from New York that the postal service ought to be and can be put upon a paying basis by reducing its non-paying portions. If New York and the other five States which have been named as contributing more than they cost pay more to the postal service of the country than the other States, they must remember that as indemnification they hold the business of the country. They communicate by mail with the most remote post-offices in the country, and so long as they hold the business it does not become them to come here and deny those remote parts of the country the necessary mail facilities, or, in order to reduce the rates of postage between the great cities, sacrifice the newly-developed portions.

I have learned from official sources that if you make this reduction you will cut off some 12,000 post-offices, which of course would all be in the thinly-settled portions, and deny them postal services. I appeal to the House not to permit this reduction, and I therefore move you as an amendment what I send to the Clerk's desk, which is simply the estimate of the Department. I will say in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who wishes to fix the amount to be appropriated to the railroad service and the steamboat service and the star service, that this would be better left as it is under the present system, to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Railroads are being built every day, and of course the transportation is taken from the stage lines and put upon the railroads the moment it can be done. I hope the amendment which I send up will be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred upon Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, as follows:

For transportation of mails by railroads $9,000,000: Provided, That the maximum amount which shall be paid to any railroad shall not exceed $450 per annum per mile; for all other inland transportation $7,000,000.

It will be seen that I propose to augment the amount included in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and to make the whole sum appropriated for inland transportation $16,000,000 instead of $14,500,000 as provided in the bill; in other words, to make it about a million and a half dollars less than it would be under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] I desire to call attention to a few figures in this connection. The estimate of the Postmaster-General for inland transportation for the year for which we are now appropriating was $17,584,000. The expenditures for the year which ended on the 30th of June last was something over $15,000,000—fifteen million three hundred thousand and odd dollars, I think. The expenditures for the current fiscal year, which will end on the 30th of June next, actual and estimated for the last quarter, will be about $16,103,732, as is stated in the letter of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, dated April 26 of this year. The amount stated in the amendment which I propose is a fraction less than the expenditures actual and estimated for the current year. I have indicated in my amendment the amount which shall be expended for the railroad service, for the steamboat service, and for the star service, giving nine millions to the railroad service and seven millions to the steamboat and star service.

Now the figures indicated in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that five or six mills per linear foot might be possible to keep the appropriation within reasonable limits, but I have my doubts as to that, and my own judgment is that with that deduction the service will require more money than was ever required from the Government for the railroad service in any one year. The railroad service, under the present weighing system, requires $10,500,000, and, if we can reduce the amount by this amendment to five mills ins ead of six and six mills instead of seven, we may possibly arrive at some reduction, but at seven mills it will give to some railroads over $1,000 a mile. Putting it at one mill below that amount, it may possibly make it a little below $1,000 a mile, but very little. I state what I know, and no one will say hereafter that he was mistaken or misled because the calculation was not made.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from Texas please give us the basis of his statement? I have heard him make that statement several times, but at present we have only his assertion of the fact.

Mr. REAGAN. I have given the basis several times if the gentleman had done me the honor to listen to me. I take one route, the route from New York to Chicago. I assumed that two hundred and ten feet of linear space in the railroad cars would be necessary on that route. The superintendent of railroad transportation told me that my assumption was correct enough for practical purposes. This line will be run at a rate of speed of more than twenty-five miles per hour. Now, multiply two hundred and ten by seven mills; multiply that product by the number of days in the year; that will give the cost per mile; multiply that product by the length of the route in miles, and you have the cost per mile, and the cost of the service for the whole route.

Mr. REAGAN. I regret that I could not get in any of my other statements.

Mr. DANFORD. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the House or the committee in attempting to proceed upon a principle that shall make the postal service of this country self-sustaining is at fault. We should carefully avoid extravagance, carefully avoid everything that will lead to abuse in the postal system, and yet we should have in view, so far as the postal service is concerned, the facilities of the mail service to every part of the country, and we should take into account and calculation the sentiment of the people in relation to that service and its extent and we should then be willing to pay for it.

Let us examine for a moment what this idea of a self-sustaining Post-Office Department leads to. It is impossible to make the service self-sustaining in the State of Texas or in many of the States of the South and West, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to a fact in that connection. During the war, perhaps in 1864 or 1865, when the South was mainly cut off from the postal service, the Department was self-sustaining. That may be accounted for by the number of persons who were in the Army and the increased correspondence resulting therefrom. To a very great extent it was because of the cutting off of mail facilities for the South, and we cannot have a postal service that is self-sustaining unless we put upon the East the burden of sustaining the service in the South and West.

Take the great cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia in the East and the great cities in the West. Undoubtedly they pay more by far of the general revenues of the Post-Office Department than the cost of their free-delivery system and all their other mail expenses together. The excess goes into the general revenues of the Post-Office Department and swells the receipts of the Department. I believe that the true principle for this Committee of the Whole to act upon is to see that there are no abuses in carrying the mails, to see that they are carried with facility and delivered with certainty, and then to pay for that service at fair and remunerative prices, without regard to whether the whole postal system is self-sustaining or not. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] perhaps renewed by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] in my opinion is objectionable. I find this remarkable fact in connection with the postal service last year, and the attention of the Committee of the Whole was called to it by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in his general remarks upon this bill, that while the cost of the railroad and steamboat service was increased the cost of the star services was decreased. But I appeal to all my colleagues on this floor who represent rural districts to state what was the cause of that decrease. It was because we could not get the proper amount of service.

I have repeatedly gone to the Post-Office Department for the purpose of getting an increase of mail service on particular routes; to get the mail carried six times a week instead of three times, or three times a week instead of once a week, and I was told that there was no money for the purpose. I suppose there is scarcely a member upon this floor who has not received the same answer from the Department.

In this bill is contemplated an adjustment of the compensation to railroads upon a different system from that in vogue at present. It is not safe to say that we will appropriate a specified sum for this service and that we will stop the service when that specific sum has been exhausted. I believe we should put in the hands of the Postmaster-General all he asks for in his estimates. It will be conceded by all parties, I have no doubt, at least by all who have had anything to do with that official, that he is honestly and earnestly attempting to carry on his Department honestly and fairly and in the interest of economy. I do not think he should be crippled by the House dividing up the appropriation for mail transportation, and saying that he shall use only so much of it for one branch of the service and so much for another branch. I believe that it will be true economy and in the interest of the service to give the Postmaster-General what he asks for carrying on the postal service of the country, in the full belief that if it is not all needed for that service it will not be all expended.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$6,237,851" and inserting "$6,737,851." In the few remarks I made to the Committee of the Whole in the general debate upon this bill I directed my attention to this item of inland transportation.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to call his attention to the fact that that item embraces not only the appropriation for the star service but also the steamboat service, which amounts to $800,000 more.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is not now in order, except as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer my amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already pending an amendment to that amendment, offered by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] The question is now upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Is debate exhausted on the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it be in order to move to strike out the last word pro forma?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to move to strike out the last word of the substitute, but not of the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I make that motion for the purpose of saying a word in reply to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] He read from the estimates of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that the amount for transportation was $16,103,000. I wish to call his attention to the fact that in that estimate is an item in the nature of deficiencies of $816,717.56, which if deducted will leave the whole amount for transportation only about $40,000 less than he proposes by his amendment. I believe his amendment proposes to increase the amount to $16,000,000. I desired to call his attention to that particular fact.

I wish to state another thing in regard to the very extraordinary figures which he has so frequently presented concerning the railroad service, which he says will amount in some instances under this bill to over $1,000 a mile. He instanced the route from New York to Chicago. I undertake to say that the gentleman has not as yet satisfied me, nor do I think he has satisfied this House, that his proposition is correct. But suppose it were true with reference to that particular road—the main trunk road; it would not be true with regard to all the other roads in the country. That road is the main carrying line; and if the proposition be true with regard to it, it is not true with regard to any other road. At least he has failed to make a satisfactory exhibit of the figures demonstrating that result. The reason of the high rate of transportation upon that main trunk line is found in the immense concentration of mail matter upon it; and that the rate should be higher is therefore but to be expected.

The gentleman from Ohio has said that the Committee on Appropriations desire to make this a paying service. Sir, I suppose it is true that every member of the committee and every gentleman of the House would be glad to do this; but I do not suppose there is any man here who expects to do it. It has not been a paying service since the war. Many years will elapse before it can be made so. I, for one, would not cut down the transportation of the mails a single dollar below what I believe to be right and essential to an efficient service. It is upon that basis that the Committee on Appropriations have based their calculations—looking to the efficiency of the postal service, at the same time having due regard to economy.

Now, we ought to take something into account for the saving in the letting of contracts. The contracts have been let recently at much lower rates than formerly. This is a fact that ought to be considered by the Committee of the Whole, and it is a very important fact. I have no doubt that under the administration of Postmaster-General Jewell the contracts for mail carrying have been let at far lower rates, and more fairly to the Government, than they have before been since the war. For one, differing in political sentiment with Mr. Jewell, I am free to say that I believe he has an honest desire to administer his office as economically as the nature of the case will permit. It is reasonable to suppose that the recent lettings will save to the Government a considerable amount, and this ought to be credited to the transportation service.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I undertand him to say that he favors the amendment offered by the committee fixing the amount for transportation other than by railroads at $6,237,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe that is sufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the gentleman to say further that the contracts for this transportation to which the $6,237,000 applies have been made at less rates than heretofore.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand so.

Mr. FOSTER. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the amount proposed for this service is greater than the cost of inland transportation of this character last year. I wish to inquire of the gentleman why it is proposed to appropriate in this bill a greater sum than the actual cost last year of this transportation upon other than railroad routes?

Mr. ATKINS. The number of routes of the star service has been increased, and we have enlarged the amount of that service $100,000 above what it was last year.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman says that the contracts have been let at lower rates.

Mr. REAGAN. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has called my attention to the fact that the statement which I read from the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of April 25, showing that the mail facilities for the year ending June 30, 1876, would cost $16,103,000, embraced three items aggregating $853,000 which he claims do not belong to that estimate at all. Now, my friend as a member of the Committee on Appropriations must have examined all this matter. If he had looked over this statement carefully, he would have seen that after stating as far as possible the cost, the following language occurs:

> This statement does not include the cost of railroad service on routes whereon the compensation has not yet been adjusted under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1873, nor the increase in pay of railroads whose compensation has been adjusted on weights taken during the present fiscal year, and not yet paid, nor the cost of new railroad service ordered during the current fiscal year not yet paid.

It will be seen that these three items are embraced in the calculation and constitute a part of the aggregate. It is not necessary for me to state to my friend, who has looked over this report, that it was necessary to include these items in order to arrive at the cost of the service for this year.

The gentleman from Tennessee has doubted the correctness of the figures which I gave with regard to the mail-route from New York to Chicago, and has said that even if my statement is true with regard to that route, it is the only one to which the statement is applicable. Why, sir, I can tell the gentleman what I supposed he as a member of the Committee on Appropriations had already learned, that, according to the statement of the superintendent of railway mail service, Mr. Vail, it takes twenty linear feet more for the mails between New York and Philadelphia than for those between New York and Chicago, thus largely increasing the price per mile. Hence my remark applies as well to the Pennsylvania Central, and possibly other roads, as to the line between New York and Chicago. While the gentleman may now believe that my calculation is not correct, yet I am confident that at the next session he will find it to be well founded. As I observed a while ago, I do not want the Committee of the Whole to act in ignorance of the fact that if the original bill passes we shall increase the pay of the railroads to $1,000 a mile.

Mr. ATKINS. Why, then, does not the gentleman propose to reduce the rate of compensation below five and six mills?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not the control of this bill. I do not propose to change the system; but I propose in the amendment which I offer to say that the compensation shall not exceed so many mills per mile, as the Postmaster-General may direct. My amendment does not propose to pay so many mills absolutely, but to fix a maximum so that no railroad shall be allowed more than $450 a mile per annum. Adopting an intelligent basis, I propose to allow an increase of $75 per mile per annum over the highest price that was ever paid for mail service prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873.

I have not done it for the purpose of leaving it in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to compensate railroads according to the nature and extent of the service performed within the maximum of $450 per mile per annum. This will make it reasonable. It ought to carry any service. It ought to carry as costly a service as my friend from Illinois can want. The Postmaster-General received as quick service before the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, as he receives to-day and he received it for $375 a mile. I propose to give $75 more.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the proviso.

My reason for doing that, Mr. Chairman, is this: It seems to be a universal habit in this House for both sides to applaud our distinguished Postmaster-General. Both sides of the House seem to vie with each other in declaring their perfect confidence in the distinguished gentleman who occupies the position of Postmaster-General. Yet gentlemen come here and say you may pay the railroad so much "provided." Why do they not trust to the Postmaster-General, and let him make the best bargain he can? Does the gentleman from Texas pretend to understand so well the service that he can come here and say that more than a certain amount shall not be given? Does he know more than a certain amount will not be earned? If the Postmaster-General is an honest man, and we all proclaim him such, then say to him "you shall have so much money; you shall conduct the transportation of the mails in the most economical manner, but we will not say you shall not give to this or that line more or less."

If the line, for example, from New York to Chicago, which carries so vast a tonnage of mail matter, running three or four immense mail cars, beside the mail carried on other lines—if that railroad shall not receive over four hundred and odd dollars a mile, what would become of the mail which has to go over that route? Will he send it some other way? Is it in the interest of some other railroad?

My impression is that the most economical plan is to let the Postmaster-General make the most economical terms he can with whatever railroad he may. We will get a cheap service then, but we will not get a cheap service if the gentleman's plan comes in to hamper the actions of the Postmaster-General. My own impression is that between New York and Chicago it is utterly impossible to carry heavy mails at over 30 miles an hour at less than $1,000 a mile. But how much is it going to cost? The whole addition is $390,000. Three hundred and ninety thousand dollars to give mail facilities for 20,000,000 of people!

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois know the average speed of the line from New York to Chicago?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not, precisely.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is only 28 miles an hour.

Mr. HARRISON. O, no! I think it is about 37 miles an hour.

Mr. REAGAN. And they are getting over a $1,000 a mile instead of $338.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps in some portions of the route they do run at forty miles an hour, but the average speed I believe is twenty-eight miles an hour.

Mr. HARRISON. The facts are simply these. There is one trunk line which carries the mail from the East, not to Chicago, for that is a mere distributing point, but to the whole Northwest and the whole Southwest—to the great West. It carries it there at a cost even let us suppose of $1,000 a mile. That is simply because there is such a vast amount of mail which goes over it, and which goes by the fast line twenty-four hours, certainly twelve hours, quicker, if it goes at a speed of thirty miles an hour. It is then distributed to Texas, to Kansas, to Nebraska, and away up to the northern part of Minnesota——

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the objection the gentleman from Illinois has just made to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will apply with equal force to the whole bill. The gentleman from Texas, as I understand his amendment, proposes that the pay for railroad transportation of mails shall be so many millions of dollars. The criticism made by the gentleman from Illinois is that it should not be limited, but that it should be left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a single fact, that the Postmaster-General in his estimate says it will take $10,500,000 to pay for the transportation of the mails by railroad service and it will take $4,659,000 to pay for inland service besides that of railroad transportation. Now I wish to ask the gentleman, if this amount was limited for the transportation of the mails by railroad, whether that will or not cripple the railroad service? If that should be so, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the same objection cannot be made so far as the inland service is concerned?

I indorse every word which was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] in regard to the increase of mail facilities. I represent a rural district, and many of my people do not get a mail but once a week. Many have to go twenty-five miles to get a letter. I myself have but three mails a week from the railroad to the town in which I live, and when I asked the Postmaster-General for an increase of service, so I might get a mail a day, I was answered by the Postmaster-General that there was no appropriation for it. If I ask him to put service on a new mail route in some other part of my district, the answer always is "we have no appropriation." If I ask him to increase the salary of a postmaster who gets only $12 a year to $30, $50, or $100, such a sum as would be commensurate with the duties he performs, the avariable reply is "there is no appropriation."

Now, it seems to me that we are to hamper the Postmaster-General still further by this stingy process. It seems to me that we are going to cripple the service and to promote ignorance throughout the country; and since that side of the House say that they do not intend to give every man in this country a chance to receive at least one letter a week or to put it within his reach, they proclaim to the country that they prefer darkness rather than light.

Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that every man in this country has a right to ask this House to appropriate enough money to bring his mail at least within five or six miles of his home. The amount appropriated by this bill will not do it. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations himself admits that there are but three of these large cities that pay any revenue for the carrier system. Now, I ask him, if there are but three large cities in the Union where the carrier system pays any revenue to the Government, can it be expected that the rural districts will pay any revenue to the Government? I think there is but one reasonable view of this whole question, and that is to compel the Postmaster-General to bring mail facilities within the reach of every man in this country, at least within four or five miles of his home, let it cost what it will, and that this House shall make appropriations sufficient for this purpose.

I would remark in conclusion that no man on this side of the House will say that I am aiming to run this Government into excessive extravagance. I believe I have voted for every economical proposition that has been submitted. But I think this is going to an unreasonable extreme. If we agree to this we are saving money at the expense of promoting ignorance; and to spread ignorance abroad over the land is worse than to spend money to promote intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 53 and 54 "$14,500,000" and insert "$17,548,000."

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I wish to say that that is precisely the estimate of the Postmaster-General.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, there were—ayes 40, noes 73; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WHITE and Mr. ATKINS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 66.

So, further count not being demanded, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana:

Strike out "$6,237,851" and insert "$6,737,851."

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that a reduction?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is an increase.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is an increase of $500,000 in the amount for the service other than the railroad service.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Indiana has failed to give all the facts relative to the service other than the railroad service. If the amendment of the committee is to be adopted, I would perfect it as far as my amendment goes, as it affects the star service and the steamboat service. The amount of increase has been understated. This item for inland transportation gives us some three millions less than the estimate of the Post-Office Department.

I insisted the other day, as I now insist, that the passage of the bill with so large a reduction for inland transportation will work disastrously in all the remote portions of the country. I endeavored to state how it would affect the State which in part I have the honor to represent.

I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] preferring that amendment to mine. But if the amendment of the committee is to be adopted, I do claim that the item provided for the star service should be increased to the amount indicated by my amendment. The gentleman from Kansas tells us that the Post-Office Department has insisted that at least 12,000 post-offices must be discontinued if the present amount be appropriated. We know very well that in addition to the increase of some eight thousand mails in the last session of the last Congress, there has been an increase during the present Congress of some seven or eight thousand miles, and another large route bill is being prepared which will also increase the amount of land transportation. There have been within the past week some four hundred new post-offices established, and the number is continually increasing. And yet in the face of this fact that the gentleman from Indiana cannot deny, we are asked to appropriate only about $100,000 more than we appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1875; and the estimates are not brought down to the present time. It will take at least a half million more of money to provide for this branch of the service to which my amendment applies than has been appropriated heretofore. The increase in this inland transportation as a whole comes almost wholly in this branch of the service. The amount of railroad increase is far less than that of the land carriage by all other means of transportation.

Now I will confess to the gentleman from Indiana that I shall be satisfied with his amendment if it be amended as I have indicated; but I had understood him to say in his remarks the other day that that part of the bill which provides for railroad transportation was in harmony with the recommendation of the Post-Office Department. I understand to-day that the Post-Office Department is not in harmony with the committee as to the mode of the computation, and that the Department will be as dissatisfied with this branch of the bill as with any other; but if this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is to pass, then it will enable the Department to treat the great rural districts of the South and West far better than it could do under the bill as it was originally reported, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Minnesota to say that the Post-Office Department is opposed to the method of compensating railroad companies?

Mr. DUNNELL. I was perhaps unfortunate in the use of a word; I should have said "rate" instead of "method."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true; the Post-Office Department wanted a higher rate; they propose a rate of from 6½ mills to 9 mills per linear foot of car space, and the bill as it stands provides for only 6 to 7 mills. But the Department was entirely in harmony with the Committee on Appropriations as to basing compensation upon space rather than weight. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is now the pending question.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that it be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is simply an increase of half a million dollars over the sum proposed by the bill. I do not think the gentleman from Minnesota is justified by the data which we have before us in pressing that amendment. I take the last report we have received from the Post-Office Department, the last information received by the House, the letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of this matter, and bearing date of the 26th of April last, and on that data contained in that letter I know the gentleman cannot sustain that amendment. I know further that for maintaining in its entire vigor the rural postal service the sum recommended in this bill is sufficient.

Now let me call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to a fact to which I have been trying to get the attention of the committee since this bill has been before it. I am anxious to support the usual service performed on horseback and in coaches, and to say that the great railroad service shall be prevented from encroaching upon the rural service. The expenditures for the last year, including the star routes and steamboat service—they are not separated and never have been—was $6,137,857. Now I assume that there must be and should be some increase in that branch of the service; but the Second Assistant Postmaster-General shows in his report that while last year on account of more favorable contracts the number of routes was increased to the extent of 8,776 miles, the cost was actually reduced $46,688.

The gentleman certainly will not expect that the postal service will be extended to a greater degree than 800 or 1,000 miles per year. That is fully up to the average of the increase in the postal facilities of this country, and the gentleman will see that the appropriation of $6,800,000 is sufficient; but then we have additional data, the report made to the House on the 26th day of April, from which it appears that even with this increase in the number of miles of postal service performed, and on account of the more honest administration of the Post-Office Department, there is an actual reduction in the expenditures of the star service for the present year of $41,745. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to lose sight entirely of the fact that this shrinkage of value that is going on in this country in the heavy reduction of the circulating medium is affecting this Department as it has affected every other Department of the Government. And if the House makes this appropriation without taking into consideration the more honorable administration of the Post-Office Department and the great shrinkage of values, they will leave important factors out of the account. Why, certainly gentlemen can see when they look over the increase of inland transportation that it is largely the result of the hopeless demoralization of that branch of our service; but the country is recovering from it, and the extraordinary increase from $9,000,000 up to $16,000,000 or $17,000,000 must naturally recoil again under an honest administration of that Department. Now, to avoid any possibility of doing injustice to this branch of the service we add $100,000 to the amount expended last year; we therefore not only have the advantage in the increased amount available for new routes organized and of the more honest administration of the Department, but we also add $100,000 for the enlargement of that branch of the public service. I am glad, therefore, sir, that this single question of the rural routes, star routes, and steamboat routes stands separate and by itself, so that we shall have the full benefit of a more thorough itemizing of the appropriation than has heretofore been done in the estimates. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the House will now consent to vote on the subject.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the condition in which we are placed. Hitherto the appropriation has been made in lump for the cost of the transportation of the mails. The appropriations have in fact been distributed to three great branches, railway transportation, steamboat transportation, and the star transportation; that is, the transportation on horse-back and in stage-coaches. The aggregate mileage per annum upon railroads was 75,000,000 miles; upon steamboats it was about 4,000,000 miles; and by the star routes about 55,000,000 miles. Thus 40 per cent. of all our mails in this country are carried by the star service. The cost per mile last year was: for the steamboat service, 17¼ cents; for the railroad service, 12¼ cents; and for the star service, 9.97—not quite 10 cents per mile—making the star service the cheapest of all.

It so happens that the railroad service is an inevitable thing in this country, a service which we must have. Nobody proposes to take the mails away from the railroads, nor does anybody propose to take them away from the steamboats. If there be any deficit whatever it must fall on the star service. Now what is that star service? Last year it amounted to 55,000,000 miles of travel, crossing our country in every direction, going into the agricultural and mining districts, even into the wilderness, away from all the great thoroughfares. In those sections of the country the people depend wholly upon this the cheapest of our services, the star service. If there be anywhere any crippling it must fall upon the star routes. It cost us last year $17,500,000 for transporting the mails, not including the other charges. Of that sum about $9,250,000 went to the railroads, $750,000 to the steamboats, and $5,500,000 to the star service.

Mr. HOLMAN. What year was that?

Mr. GARFIELD. Last year. Now if we appropriate a sum in lump, cutting that amount down by three millions, as this bill proposes, where will the reduction be felt? I grant that something may be saved by reduction in the contracts for the star service. Something doubtless may be saved by the new method of compensating the service upon railroad routes. By all these elements we might reduce the appropriation somewhat. But the Committee on Appropriations have succeeded in doing two things: they have put a rate in this bill that will cut off all the fast railroad lines of service; all that we now call the fast railroad service will go by the board. If this bill passes as it now stands every mile of that service must be dropped, and the Committee on Appropriations admit it.

All else that you do in the way of cutting down by this bill will fall upon the star service. There must fall, I believe, of the star service at least 10,000,000 miles in the country districts if you pass this bill as it now stands in this respect. I do not think it is necessary to increase the appropriation as much as some gentlemen have said.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken, I think. He assumes that we retain the aggregates for all of the inland transportation, does he not?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not speaking of the distribution, I am speaking of the lump sum.

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not propose a lump sum. We appropriate specifically for the railroad service, the steamboat service, and the star service.

Mr. GARFIELD. For the moment I am speaking of the bill as it is printed. I do not know the exact form of the amendment proposed. The gentleman proposes to distribute the appropriation, so much for railroad service, so much for the steamboat service, and so much for the star service. I have this to say, that it is impossible at this time and in advance to determine just how this appropriation should be distributed. The railroad postal service is growing rapidly each year. The steamboat service is not growing, rather falling off in mileage. The star service ought to grow perpetually, until the whole country shall become as thickly settled as are the New England States. If you proceed by the rule of last year alone, you will be quite sure to go wrong. I am therefore inclined to think that a lump sum for mail transportation, larger than the committee has reported in this bill, larger by about $1,000,000, will save our transportation of the mails, the star service and all. If you put it below that, the country districts must inevitably suffer and have their short routes cut off.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. We are now considering only the rural service, the star service and the steamboat service alone, for the amendment applies to them exclusively.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was speaking of the bill as printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. We propose to appropriate so much for the star service and the steamboat service in the aggregate, because the one is diminishing and the other increasing, and we want the star service to have the benefit of the reduction in the steamboat service.

Mr. ATKINS. The amount for the star service last year was $5,553,851 and for the steamboat only $684,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I quoted those figures.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The only objection I see to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is that it does not propose a sum high enough. It has been characterized as exorbitant, but I expect to show very conclusively that it is not exorbitant; that a reasonable figure for that service will come fully up to $7,000,000.

It has been said again and again by gentlemen that last year the total allowance for the star service and the steamboat service was $6,137,851. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that for this year the expenditure will be about $41,000 less, and that was only by making cheaper and better contracts. It is within my own knowledge, and within the knowledge of a great many gentlemen here, that that was not the only mode of reducing the expenditures. The reduction was made by actual reduction of service on routes where the service was needed, by reducing the service to weekly and semi-weekly trips; and in consequence of that reduction complaints have come from every quarter of the western and southern country. That was an exceptional saving, a saving that cannot be renewed. If the gentleman says that it will keep pace with the general reduction of expenditures that we have made, I will convince him in a few words that he is mistaken; for, while the amount of the star service, $6,137,851, was, according to his statement, reduced last year by $41,000, there was an increase of $1,000,000 in the total expense of the service. The aggregate expenditure last year was $15,300,000, this year it will be $16,200,000—an increase of 7 per cent. in the total expenditure, although in the one item of star service there was a decrease. This seems to have been in accordance with the old rule of taking from the poor and giving to the rich. While service was withdrawn from routes on the frontier, the lightning service was established between the large cities. We were deprived of mail service in order to furnish the means for this increased expenditure in localities already enjoying large mail facilities.

I take the position that the increase of 7 per cent. in the total expenditure of last year was a fair annual increase; and it is so stated in another portion of this report. Consequently if the star service had been treated with the same fairness as other branches of the service, there would have been an increase of 7 per cent. in the expenditure for the star service, instead of a reduction of $41,000. Now I propose that we shall not repeat the injustice which was done last year; that we shall first add 7 per cent. to put the service upon the proper footing for the present year, and then add 7 per cent. for the year to come. It has been stated by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that, according to experience, the annual increase of the total service is about 7 per cent. Now if to the actual expenditure for the star service last year you add 7 per cent. for this year, and then add 7 per cent. for next year, the total amount requisite would be $7,014,000. This is the amount that would be required if we place this service for the present year upon an equality with all other branches of the service and then allow an increase of 7 per cent. for the next year.

But I will go one step farther. If 7 per cent. is the correct addition to be made to the aggregate annual expenditures for this service, I maintain that the frontier States, which are filling up more rapidly than other sections of the country, are entitled to more than the average. Every gentleman who has consulted the statistics or has any general information as to the progress of our country knows that the new States increase in population much faster than the others. Still I ask only that they shall have their fair average of mail service.

Mr. HOLMAN. The general statements and theories of the gentleman from Texas are of very little practical value in comparison with actual past results. Now, the gentleman must have seen that the Postmaster-General in his last report states that 8 776 miles in length of routes have been added to the service, and that there has been a decrease of $48,688 in the cost of routes. Now, how the gentleman, with this information before him, could indulge in his general statements passes my comprehension.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Does that report show or does the gentleman know the number of routes discontinued, and the amount of decrease in mail service?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there has never been a year in our whole history when more or less lines have not been discontinued. For instance, the mail route by the Ohio River has been discontinued within the present month.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I merely wish to know whether there was any statement as to the discontinuance of service.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; there is no statement of that; but the increase in the amount of service is stated at 8,776 miles. This results in part, as my friend from Pennsylvania has suggested, from the fact that the increase of our railroad system reduces necessarily the number of rural lines. But my friend must notice another fact, that even last December the Postmaster-General put the expense for this year at $16,471,000, while by the report which came in after three-quarters of the year had gone by, furnishing good data upon which to calculate the fourth quarter, it was found that the expenses for the current year will be about $16,103,000, over $300,000 less than the estimate of last December, this difference resulting from the fact to which attention has been called—a more efficient administration of the Post-Office Department and the making of more advantageous contracts for the Government.

Mr. PAGE rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that after the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is heard, debate on the pending amendment be closed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the very lucid explanations made upon this subject by the gentleman who has charge of this bill; but I fear he has made a mistake in basing the estimate for the star service for the next fiscal year upon the amount expended for the same service during the last fiscal year.

Under the contracts entered upon in 1874 it is very well known there were hundreds of straw bids, that contractors entered upon the service for less than one-fourth the amount Government is to-day paying for the same service. They were run under straw bids for six or seven months during the year to which the gentleman has so frequently referred. It is well known there was a saving under the bids of the year 1874 of between six and seven hundred thousand dollars for the same service over the previous four years. In every instance they were compelled and the Post-Office Department has been compelled to pay in many cases the amount that was paid under the old contract; and if he bases his estimate on the amount paid for carrying this star service from the 1st of July, 1874, to the 1st of July, 1875, he will find that he has, in my judgment, made a mistake, and there will be a large deficiency to carry these mails on the same routes on the amount the Post-Office Department is now paying.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The question recurred on Mr. DUNNELL's amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 28.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I offered an amendment increasing the appropriation $390,000 for railroad service.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was offered and withdrawn, and not renewed.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not the amendment susceptible of further amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I move to add $500,000 to the appropriation for railroad service.

Mr. HARRISON. What became of my amendment increasing the appropriation $390,000?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not renewed.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to state—it has not been contradicted here and I believe the committee agree with me—that the amount appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations, as shown by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] does in fact destroy the fast-mail trains of the country. I propose an amendment adding half a million dollars for the purpose of maintaining those fast-mail trains.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing which illustrates the Bourbon tendency of the democratic party it is this disposition to go back, to recede from the rate of progress made by the Postmaster-General under the auspices of the republican party. This proposition of the committee reduces the speed of the fast-mail trains of the country to twenty-five miles per hour or a little over twenty-five miles per hour. That is the effect of it, and no one denies it. I wish to know whether gentlemen are willing to take a step backward in the interest of Bourbonism or not. The effect of my amendment will be to continue the fast-mail service of the country.

Mr. HARRISON. Gentleman seem to think the fast-mail-train service applies only to the line running between Chicago and New York. Every single train throughout the country, every express train in the United States running over thirty miles an hour has attached to it a car for fast-mail service. It is well known if you reduce the payment below 7 mills per linear foot of car space it will take the mail car off every express train running in the United States, and it will force the mail car to go by accommodation trains instead of by through express trains. You who live at remote distances, who have a train once a week, it will go to you on the slow instead of the fast train. I have information from the superintendent of the postal railroad mail service, Mr. Vail, and he had it from the able man in the position before him, Mr. Bangs, that at a compensation under 8 mills per linear foot it was impossible to support a fast mail. I do not mean only a fast-mail service from Chicago to New York, but a fast-mail service from here to Richmond, or fast-mail service over a single line of railroad which runs at a speed of over thirty miles an hour. If we want a fast-mail service, we are informed from the best authority we must pay at least 8 mills per linear foot of car space. To carry that through, it will require, I am informed from the Post-Office Department, the appropriation which I have proposed; that is, an addition of $390,000 to the appropriation recommended from the Committee on Appropriations.

I am for retrenchment as much as any man in this House. I have always voted for rtrenchment. I have never opposed it. I am told I voted against it. Sir, I did vote for an appropriation here, but it was for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of our Government, and the gentleman voted against it; and the consequence was he dared not go to Philadelphia the other day to see the inauguration. [Laughter.] I voted for it, and I went there to thank Heaven our country has lived one hundred years.

I am for retrenchment, but if you want mails carried into Georgia, into New Orleans, into any State on an express train, you must pay the railroads at least 8 mills per linear foot of car space. If you do not do that, the railroads have the right to put the mails upon slow trains instead of upon express trains. They will then go upon trains which do the local business instead of trains which run through from remote points at a speed of over 25 or 30 miles an hour. To pay that 8 mills per linear foot we must make an addition to the appropriation—not $500,000, as the gentleman from Ohio proposed, but as I am informed from the Post-Office Department, and I know they are not opposed to retrenchment in governmental expenditures, an addition of $335,000. That addition will be ample to continue the fast-mail service in the country, to the whole country, and not only on the line between Chicago and New York.

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing to change my amendment and make the amount $390,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is modified in the way he has indicated.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. FOSTER. I will withdraw the amendment if the gentleman from Indiana will renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I renew the amendment.

If this amendment should be adopted, running the cost of the railroad transportation of the mails something beyond $9,000,000, I should take it for granted that the Committee of the Whole would expect the Committee on Appropriations to reconsider their action adopting the plan proposed for compensating the railroad companies in this bill. The only effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] is, not to create a fast-mail line, but to increase the aggregate for railroad transportation from $8,800,000 to about $9,200,000; and gentlemen must see that there is no retrenchment at all virtually in this appropriation. Indeed, sir, the amount appropriated would exceed the expenditures of last year.

The present Postmaster-General, I believe, has never been charged with Bourbonism, and yet the Postmaster-General, following the line of all his predecessors except two, said this:

> For years the franking business was an incubus on the Department and an obstacle to efficient postal reform. Its abolition, for which we are largely indebted to the resolution and wisdom of my predecessor, opens the way for other measures which have yet to be inaugurated and pressed to a successful issue before the Department can become self-sustaining. While I do not flatter myself that I shall be able to accomplish this most desirable end during the short period of my service, I propose to keep it steadily in view and to direct my best efforts toward its attainment.
> For the first time in the course of a life devoted actively to business I find myself in charge of an establishment the expenditures of which largely exceed its receipts, a state of affairs which strikes with peculiar force a mind more or less disciplined by that close inspection of accounts enforced in mercantile pursuits. In ordinary business affairs there is but one end to this condition of things—bankruptcy.

That is the view of the present Postmaster-General.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow another passage to be read from the report of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have read the first utterance of the Postmaster-General when he came into this office.

Mr. FOSTER. The other passage bears directly on this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see I have not time to be interrupted; I did not interrupt him.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought you wanted to hear this.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has spoken of the tendency to recoil and go back. I think there are one or two things my friend can learn with advantage by looking back. In that certainly honest period of the administration of our Government up to 1841, there never was a dollar of deficiency appropriated for the Post-Office Department. Up to 1851 the entire deficits would not amount in the aggregate to $2,000,000. Now we have reached a point where a deficiency in this Department of the Government of $8,100,000 is looked upon with composure. The gentleman must remember that in those Bourbon times, if he thinks proper to apply that term to those times of the past, there were no charges of corruption——

Mr. FOSTER. There was a Swartout case.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was not in the Post-Office Department. In those times there were no cheeks turning pale on this floor as when openly and above-board upon the floor of this House, while a bill connected with the postal system, the Pacific mail bill, was pending, it was charged that the measure was being carried through this House by disreputable means. There was no instance where $750,000 were alleged to have been expended for the purpose of influencing the action of Congress. There was no widespread demoralization of the service in those days of economy.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not desire to go into any political discussion on this occasion. I desire to speak directly to the Committee of the Whole on the question before us: Will we or will we not cut off the fast-mail service? That is the whole question. The amount proposed to be added by the amendment is just the amount needed to keep that service alive. But by voting that down the fast-mail service is cut off.

Why was that service put on? There were two reasons for it. The first was to save expenses. The great postal centers of the country had become so utterly clogged that the Committee on Appropriations were informed two years ago that they must build enormous additions to the leading post-offices at the great commercial centers or they must make some arrangement to empty the mails out faster. A traveling post-office on the cars was devised by which the mails were distributed and hurried through the country. The second was to enhance to a very great degree the value of the service, making it an additional blessing to the people in their commercial relations by increasing the speed with which the mails were carried.

I was reading not many weeks ago the Life and Letters of George Ticknor, who died lately at Boston. He tells us that when a young man he traveled to this city and onward south. He dined with the President on the 15th of January, 1815. That was a week after the battle of New Orleans; and not a word had been heard from that battle during that day. He went hence on a long, weary journey to Monticello to visit Jefferson. Having spent several days there, twenty-nine days after the battle of New Orleans, the first intelligence of that great victory was borne to Ex-President Jefferson by mail. That was the rate at which we were able to transact business and carry on communication between different parts of the country fifty-one years ago.

Now, every step we have taken in making our communications more rapid has lengthened the effectiveness of human life and the effectiveness of human labor. In my judgment it would be a great step backward to lose from our service the immense value to the business of the country and the business of the Government of this fast mail. And I tell you if you cut it off you must appropriate $5,000,000 in a very short time to enlarge your post-office buildings in all the great commercial centers.

Now, my friend from Indiana read a paragraph from the report of the Postmaster-General to show that he was opposed to the fast-mail service. Let me read another passage from the same report:

> During the last few months a new impetus has been given to the railway postal service and new facilities to the business of the country by the establishment of fast-mail lines. Railway post-office cars, in connection with passenger-trains, are now transported at a speed hitherto unattained in the service. Upon one of the largest lines has been placed a postal railway-train under the entire control of the Post-Office Department, carrying no passengers. All these new post-office cars bear the seal of the United States and of the Post-Office Department. It is believed that at no distant day the business of the Department will be so great as to induce the railroad companies to run similar trains from New England to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Now, one word on another point. We found on the Committee on Appropriations when we were discussing this matter two or three years ago that our practice was contrary to that of all wide-awake modern nations in reference to the mail service on railroads. A mail-train with us was one of the slowest trains, almost as slow as a freight-train or a cattle-train; the mail-train was the slow train and the express-train was the fast train, which carried passengers and their baggage. We carried passengers, baggage, and freight fast, but intelligence, thought, and the intercourse of the people was carried slowly. In England it is the other way. Let us have their system here.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that he has misapprehended the views of the Committee on Appropriations. It is not proposed to dispense with the fast-mail lines, and that will not be the operation of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] says.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the necessary effect of the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Ohio must know the fact that the fast-mail line is kept up now by concentrating a vast amount of postal matter by means of which the amount of compensation paid to the railroads is very largely increased. For instance, the present basis is weight, $25 a ton for every two thousand pounds going beyond a given number of tons. We coupled with the increased allowance for increased postal facilities all elements which enter into and furnish compensation to the railroad companies, paying to some of them as high as $1,020 a mile on the line between New York and Chicago. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposes to limit the amount to be paid to any given company. I for myself have no particular objection to that, but the effect of that amendment would be to discontinue the fast-mail service. The fast-mail service could be continued under this bill as well as under the existing law. For instance, they concentrate the entire business between New York and Chicago upon one line, the New York Central, and by that concentration of business the railroad received a largely increased compensation, and is enabled to run a fast train composed entirely of postal cars and nothing else. Gentlemen know very well that these trains do not carry passengers at all, but only railroad postal cars, two of sixty feet each and two of forty-five feet each, and have a compensation of so many mills per linear foot at a given speed, and the railroad company is thus induced to transport the mails more rapidly and expeditiously.

I take it for granted that the fast-mail lines will not be seriously affected by this bill even if you put the rates at 5 and 6 mills per linear foot and fix the rate of speed at twenty-five miles an hour. The Post-Office Department will simply increase the volume of the mails upon a particular line, and that will be the inducement to that railroad company. I feel confident that at the rate of 5 and 6 mills per linear foot, being an average of 5½ mills per foot, the fast lines can be substantially kept up. But it is certainly not consistent that the enormous increase of pay to railroad companies should continue for the purpose of giving local benefits to two great cities of the country. I am not willing to do that, and I think an appropriation of three or four millions for such a purpose is entirely unwarranted by the circumstances of the Treasury and the necessities of the country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, it is pretty plain to me that the people who will get pinched by any reduction of this inland transportation appropriation are the people who live upon small routes. In such places as have been stated here by many gentlemen the mail service will be cut off. The railroad interests will look out for themselves. There never has been a time that they did not, and there never will be a time that they will not. The history of legislation and of appropriations upon this subject since the railway postal system was adopted is all in one direction, and that direction is the swelling up of the proportionate part of the appropriation that the railways receive. It is a concentrated interest. It has at its several heads the brightest minds in the country. They can come to Washington; they can make their statement; they can make their argument. All legislation has been in the direction of putting up the pay which the railroad companies receive and swelling the amount they draw from the Treasury, unless, as in this case, a division is made, so that one part of the appropriation cannot be taken for the benefit of another branch of the service.

Now, upon this question of fast trains and slow trains there is a great deal of danger of running into something fanciful, something picturesque, something that appeals to the imagination. I remember when the fast trains were first started the illustrated papers of the country were full of illustrations of these fast trains, and they looked very well on paper. It looked well in pictures, and it was undoubtedly a convenience to New York and Chicago, and to the newspapers in New York and Chicago. But gentlemen forget—my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who has just made a speech here—forgets that we are legislating for all the people of the country, not for the people of New York and Chicago alone, and not for the little route along that line.

The gentleman says that the danger is that if this provision is adopted we will fall into the way of carrying intelligence slowly and everything else fast, and that mail-trains ought to be as fast as any other trains, or even faster. Does he not reflect that the reason why mail-trains are slower than express-trains is that they carry the mails to every town and village on the route? An express-train starts from New York for Chicago, and all or nearly all the passengers want to go through, and in the course of fifteen hundred miles it will stop at perhaps not more than ten places, and those the largest on the route. The mail-train is not run in that way; it is run for the people, and ought to be run for the people, who pay the bills, and it stops ordinarily at the smaller places on the routes. Accordingly it will be found that the mail-train he speaks so contemptuously of is a slow train, and people who wish to go clear through to the end of the route do not seek to go upon it.

Gentlemen should bear in mind that there are other places in this country besides New York and Chicago where mails must be carried, and that as they pay for their mails they should have trains that will carry their mails to them.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. If the fast-mail train from New York to Chicago and Saint Louis saves one day's time in the immense volume of the mail it carries to those places for distribution, do not the country towns in that region reap the benefit of it?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly that portion of the country that has its mails distributed from Chicago will receive the benefit of that single mail. But other mails are started from here which will go to other places, and the question comes up whether we have money enough to send a single mail through at this extravagant rate, at a cost of $12,000 or $15,000. The trouble in this as in everything else is that gentlemen, in talking about these extravagant experiments, think only of the benefits derived from them by a few large cities. I do not deny that there is a contingent benefit to be derived by other localities near the point where these fast mails are distributed. But mainly these experiments are all in the interest of an extravagant expenditure of money, when we are attempting in every way to curtail our expenses.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] can renew it.

Mr. REAGAN. I renew the amendment for the purpose of saying a word. In discussing a question of this kind I do not like to see an attempt to make a partisan matter out of it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] placed great stress on the Bourbonistic disposition of democrats here who want to stop the fast railroad-mail trains, and his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] followed in the same strain. What is said about slow and fast mail trains, in view of all the facts, might seem to one who knew what was going on, to be the simplest jargon.

What has been the experience of this country during the last few years in carrying the mails? Before 1873 we had as fast mail trains as we have had since, and paid a maximum of not more than $375 a mile for it. In that year a bill was passed—and the gentleman who is so eloquent about Bourbonism [Mr. FOSTER] may have been one of those who voted for it—which was said to be intended for two purposes, the one to obtain fast-mail trains and the other to reduce expenses. What was the result? The other day I called attention to some routes, one of which before the weighing provided by that bill received $75 per mile annually for its service, and after the weighing it received $575; another road, which before the weighing received $50 a mile, after the weighing received $705. These were two of the fastest trains I have known, and they went directly to the Treasury.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is eloquent about Bourbonism. He may have been equally as eloquent when he was putting upon us in the last Congress this additional expense of $1,600,000 a year. He is certainly eloquent now in advocating the adoption of a measure that will make it still worse; and there are democrats helping him. Now if it is Bourbonism to oppose the robbery of the Treasury of the people, then let him write me down a Bourbon. I propose to pay only a just and honest price for the best kind of mail service, railroad service and all. I want to see it done as a reasonable man would do his own business, upon an intelligible basis. I desire to see it done without that general party declamation which seems to have for its only object the making a point upon a political adversary, unsupported by facts and unsustained by reason.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It occurs to me that in fixing the pay for fast-mail trains (we are discussing that question in this connection) this bill is defective as reported, and it leads to much of the difficulty and confusion that we have had here to-day. I am in favor of the fast-mail train; I believe that we ought to have it. While I partially agree with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] yet he might have stated that the fast-mail train distributes the mails to local post-offices along the line of the road as well as the slow-mail train does, as everybody knows who has seen the mail-catchers operate. Therefore there is nothing in that point.

But I believe that this fast-mail train might be run at less cost than the Committee on Appropriations proposes to allow for it. I would strike out 6 mills and put in 5 mills per mile for trains running under twenty-five miles an hour, and I would strike out 7 mills and put in 6 mills or less for trains running thirty-five miles or more per hour, and I am inclined to believe that the rate should be even lower than this on certain roads. There is the fault in the bill, not that the pay is not enough, but that there is too much pay provided for too small speed.

I know there is a great deal of talk about 6 and 7 mills not being sufficient; it appears to be taken for granted by many gentlemen that these rates are not enough for fast-mail trains, but in my opinion they are more than enough.

I made some remarks on this subject the other day, but was cut off when I had but half stated my argument. I was then about to state, and will now state that according to the "Counting House Monitor" and other reliable authorities these great railway companies, in order to utilize the whole of their space, commute with private parties for car space at an average less than 4 mills per mile per linear foot; or rather to the passenger, he taking a foot of space the width of a car; this rate however, applying only to roads leading out of New York City; and even at that rate they are very solicitous for custom; and they do not all the time run their cars full of passengers so as to get pay for all the space in car. Yet here is a proposition that the Government shall pay 6 and 7 mills a mile per foot and pay for all the space. Now if the authorities to which I have referred be reliable—if it be true that the railroad companies for daily trips of 60 and 80 miles out of Chicago commute for less than 4 mills a mile, should not the pay allowed by the Government to these railroads be something near the same rate?

Besides that, you ought to have a sliding scale of prices. What is a proper compensation for a great railway running almost numberless trains for freight and passengers, and having all its space utilized, is not compensation upon the great majority of railway-trains in the country. Yet under the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations the same scale is to apply to all roads. The impropriety of this uniform scale appears to me too obvious for argument.

While, therefore, I would increase this appropriation, I would have the Committee on Appropriations revise the manner in which these railroad companies are to be paid, making a distinction between the different railroads according to weight carried as well as space used, and cutting down the rates in the aggregate less than 6 and 7 mills a mile.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman can hardly have failed to notice that the very first statement made this morning was that the Committee on Appropriations had determined to move to fix the compensation at 5 mills for speed up to twenty-five miles an hour and 6 mills for speed beyond twenty-five miles an hour.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But I think those rates are still too high for some roads and not high enough for others.

Mr. HOLMAN. How would you fix it?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would fix it to some extent according to the weight carried as well as the space occupied, and think the bill should be recommitted for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that the amount originally fixed by the Committee on Appropriations, $14,500,000, is adequate; but it will be observed that to avoid any misapprehension upon this subject we have inserted as the fourteenth section of the bill this provision:

That no post-office or service on any mail route necessary for the public service and required for the proper and efficient distribution of the mails shall be discontinued.

Mr. HURLBUT. How will you prevent it if you do not appropriate money enough?

Mr. RANDALL. I will show you in a moment that $14,500,000 is enough. The amount expended for the year ending June 30, 1874, was $15,400,000; for the year ending June 30, 1875, $15,350,000; and the estimated expenditure for the present fiscal year, based upon the actual expenditure for the first three quarters of the year, is $16,100,000. Now, according to all the authorities that I can gather, the provision of this bill doing away with the system of payment by weight and substituting a system of compensation by space and speed will effect a saving of $2,000,000. But, to obviate any anxiety in the minds of members, the committee made an addition of $600,000; so that there is ample margin.

But in addition to that the committee propose to reduce the rates per linear foot from 6 and 7 mills a mile to 5 and 6 mills, making a saving of about $400,000 more. Then there comes the fast line, which is to be provided for; and for that purpose $390,000 more is included in this bill. I believe that these roads ought to run at the rate of thirty miles an hour for 6 mills per linear foot of space. I have no tender feeling for the railroads. In my view there is no occasion for considering them in fixing this rate. I believe it to be adequate. I believe it is the rate which ought to be fixed. In view of the $500,000 added upon the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, I have no doubt that the sum now embraced in this bill is adequate to keep up the fast line. The idea that $390,000 more should be given to the railroads seems to me outrageous; to my mind it is nothing more than a gratuity. I hope, therefore, that it will be voted down. This may be Bourbonism, but it is honesty in dealing with the people's money.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph shall now cease; but before the question is taken on that proposition I wish, in addition to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] to read what the Postmaster-General says will be the cost of this system of mail transportation by railroads at 6½ mills. In his letter of the 2d of March he says:

The compensation based on linear space at an average rate of 6½ mills would be about $7,200,000.

The proposition pending in the bill appropriates $8,862,049, and largely beyond the estimate. The following table shows the extraordinary growth of compensation to these railroad corporations, and deserves attention:

A statement showing the amount of receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department, the amount paid to postmasters and to railroad companies; also the amount appropriated for deficiency item from 1851 to 1875 inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is exhausted.

The question recurred on Mr. FOSTER's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question next recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment as amended on motion of Mr. DUNNELL.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a substitute pending for that section.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order when the section is perfected. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] to strike out the proviso. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

The amendment was rejected.

The committee divided on Mr. REAGAN's substitute; and there were—ayes 60, noes 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative and the substitute is rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to give notice that I shall ask for a vote on my substitute in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is not agreed to, and there can be no vote on the proposition in the House.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After dollars, in the fifty-fourth line, insert:

Provided, That all public documents shall be sent through the mails to the people under the frank of a Senator, Representative, or Delegate free of postage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make a point of order.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman cannot take the floor from me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor, but the gentleman from Indiana rises to a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. While I am upon the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; but only to state the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is that the amendment is not germane to the bill; that it changes existing law and is not a measure of retrenchment.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the proposition.

Mr. WHITE. I move to insert after the word "dollars," in line 54:

Provided, No more than one-half of this amount shall be paid for railroad transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the portion of the section the gentleman proposes to amend has been voted on by the House.

Mr. WHITE. I indorse the statement made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] that the people are those who are most interested in this appropriation. The railroads and steamboats will take care of themselves, but if we do not restrict the amount to be paid to railroads, the people who live in remote localities will be shorn of the meager mail facilities they now enjoy. I hope some restriction will be made, so that at least one-half of the amount appropriated by this stingy Committee on Appropriations will go to the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The amounts have been inserted by vote of the committee, and cannot now be amended. The gentleman's amendment is therefore not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to railway post-office clerks, $1,125,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$300,000," so it will read $1,300,000.

There was expended for railroad post-office clerks for the last fiscal year $1,122,000, and there will be expended this year $1,277,000. The estimate is $1,309,000. There are three items following one another, the first for railway post-office clerks, the next for route agents, and the next for mail-route messengers, all of whom the committee have seen fit to reduce 10 per cent. These clerks, with the exception of a very few, are now paid $1,200 a year or less. They do not come within the rule the committee has laid down for the reduction of salaries. I hold in my hand a table which shows the annual compensations to this class of clerks to be $957, and from this 10 per cent. is to be taken. The table is as follows:

Tables showing the number of railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents in service May 1, 1876, with their aggregate and average compensation per annum respectively; also table showing the general average of the same.

LOCAL AGENTS.

Number.	Compensation.	Aggregate compensation.
1	$50 00	$50 00
2	60 00	120 00

I have authority from the Post-Office Department for saying that this class of clerks perform more labor daily than is performed by railroad men on the same trains. There is perhaps no class of public servants who are so hard worked as this class of gentlemen. So far as my personal knowledge goes, there is no excess in number. In all my acquaintance with the Lake Shore route, I know there is not a surplus number, and each and all are required to do their labor daily.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentleman having charge of this bill has been in error, has been misinformed, as to the pay these gentlemen get. In this city he has not reduced the pay of any officer of the Government whose salary was $1,200 or less; and that is the effect of this portion of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a very slight reduction. The committee think the appropriation is sufficient.

The question being taken on Mr. FOSTER'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

JAMES L. TEBAULT AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3431) for the relief of James L. Tebault and others; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to present the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. CONGER. This is a very long document. If it would suit the committee to have it printed in the RECORD we could all see it there.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. It will take but little time to read. A certain part of it may be omitted in the reading.

Mr. CONGER. There is a very thin House, and I think the object would be served by having it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I should prefer to have a portion of the report read. It will, of course, appear in the RECORD, and also be printed for the use of the House, but I think it would be advisable to read a portion of the report.

Mr. CONGER. How long would that take?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Fifteen or twenty minutes.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report. Before he concluded,

Mr. CONGER said: Does the gentleman from Ohio care to have all the details read?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I object to dispense with the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the Chair rule that all those details must be read in full if the gentleman from Ohio insists?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has a right to bring the report before the House and to have it read?

Mr. CONGER. I asked that it might be printed in the RECORD; that would give it all the publicity necessary.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I object to dispensing with the reading. I want to have the report read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report. Before he concluded,

Mr. CONGER said: I object to the further reading of the bill recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the bill is a part of the report. Does the gentleman from Michigan ask that the further reading be dispensed with?

Mr. RANDALL. Before that is done I desire to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the "instruction" to the Committee on Appropriations be made a "request."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman brings this up for action now. Is there objection to the further reading being dispensed with?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I shall object, unless the entire report appears in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the further reading being dispensed with and the report being printed at length in the RECORD?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object to its being printed in the RECORD unless it is all read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is simply an outrage to keep us here so long to have this read. But since gentlemen have insisted upon it, I object to its being printed unless the whole of the report is read.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Committee on Printing of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and ascertain the cost of and charges made for work done for Congress and the Executive Departments by the Government Printing Office, and what similar work costs and can be done for in other offices; that they ascertain the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the cost of having it printed by responsible private parties; that they ascertain whether the printing for Congress and the Executive Departments is done as economically as it should be or as it may be done by contract or otherwise by private parties; that they inquire into the extent of publications and printing ordered by the Executive Departments, and whether any limitations should be made upon such publications and printing beyond what is expressly authorized by law; that they make thorough examination into the operations of the Government Printing Office, with a view to learn whether a different management may be made or plan adopted to lessen the expenses of the Government for the various items of printing required; and that the committee be instructed to make to this House a full report of their investigations, together with the testimony taken by them; and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and to use a shorthand reporter"— having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following partial report:

The resolution contains five points of inquiry, which for the purposes of this report may be stated as follows:

First. What are the cost of and charges for work done for Congress and the Executive Departments as compared with the expense of doing the same work by private parties?

Second. Is the Government Printing Office economically managed?

Third. How does the cost of publishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the Government Printing Office compare with the cost if done by private parties?

Fourth. What extent of printing is done for the Executive Departments, and would it be advisable to reduce the same?

Fifth. What is the general management of the Government Printing Office?

In order to arrive at reliable information upon which to base comparisons under the first of the above subdivisions, it became necessary to obtain samples of work done at the Government Printing Office for the several Executive Departments, with statements showing the prices charged for the same. These having been procured, your committee summoned and examined as witnesses manufacturers of and dealers in printing and binding materials, also printers and other experts in these matters, to enable them to ascertain the fair expense of producing work of a similar nature. The result shows that the Congressional Printer has charged in excess of market rates in almost every instance, the excess ranging from about 30 to 125 per cent. In one instance—a case of blank-work—the Congressional Printer had charged for a certain list of items $1,824.70. Mr. De Vinne, of New York, examined samples of this work, and estimated that his establishment would produce or purchase and supply the same work, in every way equal to the samples, for the sum of $837 02. Mr. Edwards, of Baltimore, testified that he would do the work in every way equal to samples for the sum of $822.45. It will be observed that there is a difference of but $14.57 in their computations, and the figures named include their contemplated profits, while the prices charged at the Government Printing Office are more than double these figures. In explanation of this enormous discrepancy neither the Congressional Printer nor his assistants offer any excuse; in fact, it is claimed by all of them that the Government Printing Office is now being conducted as economically as possible. It may be well in this connection to state that a partial reason for the difference is to be found in the manner of making what are termed open-market purchases.

The supplies of material used in the Office are procured in two ways: All of the printing paper is purchased under contracts awarded by the Joint Committee on Printing; all other materials are purchased by the Congressional Printer at his own discretion, and this expenditure exceeds the enormous figure of $2,000,000 during the present incumbent's term of office.

Large quantities, and the certainty of prompt payment, are considerations sufficient with every business establishment to induce liberal reductions from regular rates. It was therefore a matter of surprise to your committee that, so far from purchasing at a reduction, the Congressional Printer is actually now, and has been during his entire administration, paying more than the ordinary retail-market prices for many of the articles purchased. Mr. George W. Garner, a member of the firm of John Campbell & Co., successors to Campbell & Armstrong, of New York, from whom the bulk of these purchases is made, admitted, as will be seen by reference to his testimony, that his firm was then, and had been for the last seven years, selling to the Government at prices in excess of regular quotations; he distinctly stated that a great proportion of the goods sold by his house to the Government were purchased by him from the manufacturers after receiving the orders from the Congressional Printer; that a profit ranging from 15 to 40 per cent. was charged in selling them to the Government, and that in a great proportion of cases he paid for his purchases after receiving the remittances.

The Congressional Printer admits that he has never endeavored to inform himself as to the reasonableness of the prices at which he was buying, and never inquired as to the rates charged for the goods by the manufacturers thereof. He has uniformly made all his purchases from what may properly be termed middle-men, allowing to them a heavy profit, which would otherwise have accrued to the benefit of the Government.

The testimony shows that a large manufacturing and importing establishment, one of the largest perhaps of its kind in the country, noticing from the annual reports of the Congressional Printer the high prices paid for materials, caused a member of their firm to visit him in Washington to offer equally good articles at prices much below those reported as having been paid. This proposition was disregarded, and again, about twelve months after, the manufacturers forwarded the Congressional Printer a comparative price-list exhibiting greatly reduced figures, together with a proposal to give bond "that each and every article shall be equal in every respect to those furnished him heretofore." Samples were furnished, and full satisfaction was expressed as to the quality of the goods, when a single small order was given, and then no more notice was taken of the offer.

Nor is this extravagance confined to the purchase of materials alone. The prices paid for labor are greatly in excess of those paid by other establishments, and when we remember that the number of hours constituting a day's work under the Government is fixed by law at eight, while private offices require ten, the futility of the hopes for successful competition on the part of the Government Office becomes apparent.

Two general items make up the total cost of work done in that establishment, namely, the cost of labor and the cost of materials. Rent, wear and tear, profit, insurance, taxes, &c., which must be taken into consideration by private parties, do not enter into the calculations there; but in spite of this decided advantage, the evidence conclusively shows that the cost of the Government printing has been simply enormous, and every consideration of duty requires that there be an immediate reduction of this wasteful extravagance.

In regard to the charges made for work done, your committee find that the Department accounts of the Congressional Printer exhibit a system of charges wholly incorrect. The law directs that the accounts connected with the printing of the debates of Congress shall be kept separate, and accurate reports made of them each year. It is shown in testimony that the full cost of executing this work is not reported, while that done for the legislative and executive departments as a whole is set down in excess. By thus overcharging on the great bulk of the work, a surplus account is created out of which other work can be done without record of its actual cost. As an illustration of the effect produced by this system of charging for the work done, we refer to the item of press-work. Eight single-page reports are locked into one form and printed at one impression, and then eight separate charges are made; one full charge for each document, made up in the following manner: The regular number to be printed is 1,900 and at $3 per 1,000 impressions, the expense of press-work would be fairly stated at $5.70. Now as there have been eight documents printed at one time on this sheet of paper, each one should be made to stand one-eighth of this expense, but instead, each one has been charged the full amount of $5.70, or, in other words, for press-work of 1,900 sheets a charge of $45 60 has been made, which is a little more than eight times the actual cost of the work done. There is, therefore, a surplus in reported expense of seven times $5.70 or $39.90 which is permitted to cover the undercharges made by the Congressional Printer against any other work done in his office. When it is remembered that the printing and binding done for the legislative and executive departments amount to nine-tenths of all the work ordered to be done in the Public Printing Office, and that this system of charging is applied to all of this work, it will be at once understood that a very large surplus in reported expenses is created. But by an examination of the Congressional Printer's annual reports the actual cash disbursements are found to be very near the reported cost of the work executed. Hence it appears that the surplus created in one way is consumed in another not yet satisfactorily accounted for; if honestly, then the Government Printing Office is not economically managed; if dishonestly, its condition is worse than that of extravagance. The conclusion therefore is that, as at present managed, the printing and binding for Congress and the Executive Departments are costing the Government more money than the same work can be done for equally well by responsible private parties.

The second point of inquiry is but a continuation of the first, as an economical management of the office would lead as a natural consequence to more reasonable charges for the work done, and any further extravagance would in like manner tend to increase its cost. Careful examination of the subject has demonstrated that the same reckless extravagance shown to exist in the purchase of materials and the pay for labor pervades every department of the office.

The reasonable limits of a report preclude your committee from entering into all the details of the case. It will be sufficient to call attention to a few examples.

The gold-leaf used in the Government bindery forms an important item of expense. During the term of the present incumbent a sum exceeding $50,000 has been expended for that article alone. The testimony taken by your committee establishes the fact that the men employed in the Government bindery have been allowed to appropriate to their own use the greater part of the wastage of this gold-leaf. The foreman of the bindery pleaded, in extenuation of this abuse, that this custom prevails in all private establishments. Every expert, however, employé as well as proprietor, examined as a witness, testifies that such is not the case, but that this wastage is as much a part of the property of the employer as the tools and machinery of the establishment. It is the opinion of practical binders examined that the proportion of wastage is about one-fourth of the quantity used. Therefore, as the gold-leaf consumed in the public bindery during the past seven years has cost about $57,000, the proceeds of the waste should have reached the sum of $14,000.

The foreman of binding having stated in his testimony that the waste gold reserved by the office during the entire term of the present Congressional Printer was then in his possession, the committee caused an inspection of the same to be made, when it was ascertained that there were but thirty-two and three-quarters ounces, which was subsequently melted, at the instance of the committee, by a manufacturer of gold-leaf in Baltimore, yielding the following result:

Of light gold, 18 carats fine, 449 pennyweights, at 75 cents	$336 75
Of dark gold, 23 carats fine, 30¼ pennyweights, at $1	30 25
Amounting in the aggregate to	367 00

This sum represents the entire return from gold waste during a period of seven years, which should have amounted to upward of $14,000.

Another instance will be found in the material used for binding blank-books, where a high-priced article is used by the foreman, when an article worth about $7 per dozen less would answer as well, if not better, for all practical purposes. About fifteen hundred dozen law-sheep are used annually in this manner, a system pronounced by every one conversant with the business one of unprecedented extravagance.

The quantity thus used aggregates in seven years no less than about 10,000 dozen, and represents a loss of about $70,000.

Other instances of a similar nature, such as the waste of paper, the management of the leather-scraps, the destruction of work, &c., might be cited to show that a system of extravagance unparalleled pervades every department of the establishment; and your committee are therefore of the opinion that the printing for Congress and the Executive Departments is by no means done as economically as it should be. Among the exceptions to this general rule of overcharge is, first, the work done for the United States Supreme Court, and, second, the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In both of these instances a system of undercharging and omissions to charge has been inaugurated by the Congressional Printer, which baffles all hope of arriving at their true cost from the books kept in his office. It is worthy of notice that both these classes of work were formerly done by private parties, and were transferred to the Government Office under the belief that the cost of production would be considerably reduced below that given to private parties. From the illustration heretofore given it is apparent that the Congressional Printer can very easily conceal the truth in regard to the expenses and charges made against any particular job of work, and it was in due appreciation of this fact that Congress, on the 9th of June, 1874, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to keep a separate and exact account in detail of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, including specific statements of the cost of all machinery and material which may have been or shall be used for the publication of said RECORD, commencing with its first publication at the Government Printing Office, and that he shall publish the amounts thus yearly expended in his next succeeding annual report, and each succeeding report, separately from the other disbursements of his office."

But, in spite of the mandatory provisions of this law, your committee find it impossible to arrive at any definite data as to the actual cost to the Government of publishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They believe the testimony shows conclusively that the requirements of the resolution have not been complied with, and omissions so numerous have been traced, that the reliability of the entire account seems to them a question of very serious doubt.

It appeared in evidence, for instance, that the cutter-out reported to the foreman of binding—compiled from reliable data—a quantity of leather of a certain kind and price used in binding the RECORD. This report was transmitted to the RECORD clerk, who, upon examination, found the quantity thus stated exceeded the amount of that kind of goods purchased; and thereupon he, with the consent of the foreman of binding, arbitrarily re-arranged these sums and charged them against the RECORD account as though the lowest grade of leather had been used, while the article really consumed amounted to considerably more than the sum thus charged.

In the same manner the Congressional Printer himself asserts that no charge has been made for the wear and tear of material and repairs to machinery, while the foreman of the press-room states that in consequence of the extra speed with which the presses are run in printing the RECORD they are very often found in a damaged condition, requiring frequent and expensive repairs.

Again, to show the unreliability of the charges actually made, it is only necessary to refer to the letter of Mr. J. H. Roberts, (marked exhibit N N, and attached to testimony,) addressed to Mr. DONNAN during a prior investigation, in which he fixes the cost of binding per volume of a thousand pages at seventy-eight and a quarter cents, and, in his examination (May 2) before your committee upon this point, he places the cost to-day of the same work at about seventy-five cents, thus making, during a period of two years, in which the price of labor has remained stationary, while that of material has depreciated but very little, a difference in amount of three and a quarter cents per volume. In the report of the Congressional Printer, however, the charge for binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the Forty-third Congress is stated at about sixty-five cents per volume, or, in other words, at a figure about ten cents per volume below the admitted actual cost. In view of such facts it will be seen that it is almost impossible for your committee to arrive at any definite figures upon this point, and the result of their investigation can be, at best, no more than an approximation of the amount actually expended in its production.

But taking the amount of cost as stated in the last annual report of the Congressional Printer as a basis, we have a sum reported expended of $88,959.80, to which should be added the cost of the following items, proved to have been omitted from those charged: Blank-books for keeping the accounts, stationery, brooms, rollers, roller composition, sirup, lye, ice, horse-feed, horse-shoeing, care of horses, repairs to machinery, blankets for presses, oil, benzine, fuel, steam-power, freight, hauling, gas in press and folding rooms, salary of clerk in charge of accounts, binding of one hundred copies of four volumes each in sheep and two copies of four volumes each in calf, the cost of paper for the same, and the difference between the price of leather used and that charged, and other items. The various items thus omitted amount in the aggregate to at least $12,000, so that the price of publishing this work, as established by proof, would really be upward of $100,000 instead of the sum charged; and when, in addition to this, the interest on the capital invested, the wear and tear of type and machinery, and a proportionate share of the waste of material by deterioration in value and accidental causes are taken into account, the cost of printing and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session Forty-third Congress, would, in the opinion of your committee, far exceed that amount.

Had the contract been awarded, under their bid of 1873 to Messrs Rives & Bailey, the total cost of printing and binding the same for that session would have amounted to only $93,453.75, thus effecting a large saving to the Government, amounting for a short session to not less than $15,000.

Your committee are, therefore, of opinion that it would be in the interest of economy to remove the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from the Government Printing Office and award the same to Mr. Franklin Rives, under a contract, the form of which, together with an accompanying letter addressed to the chairman of your committee, is hereto attached and made a portion of this report.

The resolution directs your committee next to inquire into the amount of work done by the Government Office for the Executive Departments. Having made this investigation, they are of the opinion that the quantity done is far more than the necessities require, while the charges made for the same exceed all reasonable bounds. They find that the only limit placed by law upon this class of work is contained in the appropriation acts which make provision for the amount to be expended for it; that this sum is placed to the credit of the public printing and binding account, against which charges are made by the Congressional Printer by the system heretofore described until it is exhausted. They find further that not unfrequently orders for a small number of blanks are sent from the Departments, which orders are repeated at short intervals, and this necessarily increases the cost over what it would be if a larger quantity were printed at the same time.

In their investigation into the general management of the office your committee encountered at the outset a serious and almost insurmountable obstacle in the absence of a reliable system of accounting. No person appears to have been charged with the inspection of the books and accounts of the establishment, and each clerk has conducted his special branch of the business in whatever manner best suited his individual fancy. No day-books or other books of original entry have been kept to show transactions as they occurred, nor do those submitted to your committee show a reliable and exact history of the business of the office. The paper accounts and warerooms-books are incomplete and useless as books of record and reference. The cash-books, supposed to show all receipts from every source, together with the deposits made in this account, show only what the persons in charge of them desired should be known, and demonstrate nothing so clearly as the neglect or incompetency, or both, of those who have kept them. None of the books furnish complete information, and, in fact, they show nothing from which to arrive at positive conclusions in regard to the business of the office.

The committee next appealed to the Congressional Printer for that information which they failed to find upon the books; but he appeared to be unable to give it. At every point he interposed answers of "I do not know," or "I did not expect to be examined upon that point," thus demonstrating fully to the minds of your committee his complete disqualification for the proper discharge of the duties of the office he holds; and the testimony of his assistants will bear the committee out in the assertion that very few of these appear to have a more thorough knowledge of the business than their chief. Under these circumstances it is hardly a matter for astonishment that the affairs of the office are imperfectly and badly managed. Nor is this all; it appears to have been part of the settled policy of the present Congressional Printer to disregard even statutory enactments which tend to subject his action to the inspection or control of others. To instance: the report required by statute to be made by him to the Secretary of the Treasury has never been made. A letter of inquiry upon this point addressed to that official by the chairman of your committee was answered as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
March 3, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, in which you inquire whether the Congressional Printer has complied with the requirements of section 3815 of the Revised Statutes, as follows: "The Congressional Printer shall render to the Secretary of the Treasury, quarterly, a full account of all the purchases made by him, and all printing done in the Government Printing Office for either House of Congress and each executive and judicial department." In reply I have to inform you that the provisions of said section have not been complied with by the Congressional Printer.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman House Printing Committee, Washington, D. C.

Again, the law requiring him to make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior has been violated from the first year of his incumbency to the last. The following letter was received upon this point from the chief clerk of the Department of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 14, 1876.

DEAR SIR: The report of the Congressional Printer, in compliance with section 3820, Revised Statutes, has been called for this day. On receipt by this Department copy of same will be furnished your committee. No report appears to have been made.

Respectfully,

A. BELL, Chief Clerk.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman House Committee on Printing.

The Congressional Printer, moreover, admits that these laws have never been complied with, and pleads in palliation the lack of sufficient clerical force; but it is the belief of your committee, based upon facts developed in the course of their investigation, that this excuse is inadmissible, because they have every reason to suppose that, with the proper management and an efficient administration of the Government Office, the clerical force as at present provided is amply sufficient to discharge all duties imposed.

The only remaining check placed upon him is his annual report to Congress, and this your committee finds to be as unsatisfactory and unreliable as the books of his office. The indefinite description of articles purchased, the vague system of reporting the amounts paid for labor, and the inaccurate enumeration of itemized charges for work done, render it impossible to gather from its pages the information which the law intends should be conveyed.

But, aside from this, it is unreliable in its entries. In proof of this it is only necessary to recall the facts previously stated in regard to the reported prices for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Many other instances might be cited, but your committee will allude to but one from among the many in this connection. In the Senate investigation of 1874, (Senate Report 474, Forty-third Congress, first session,) it was charged that these reports were inaccurate in regard to the paper accounts to the extent of more than $40,000, and in explanation the Congressional Printer submitted a series of affidavits, which appear in the report above named as exhibits A, F. These accounts, in connection with the affidavits, were re-examined by an expert accountant, and the result of this examination shows that these fail to balance the account at the end of each year, and are therefore incorrect and not in accordance with the facts. The following facts appear from the comparison thus made, (see exhibit M M appended to the testimony:)

The eighteenth annual report shows a surplus over and above the amount reported of $22,871.85; the nineteenth annual report shows a deficiency of $3,392.13; the twentieth annual report shows a surplus of $3,562.48; the twenty-first annual report shows a surplus of $564.63; thus showing the complete unreliability of this last check placed upon him by law.

But not only in regard to his reports, made or neglected, does this systematic negligence appear. The internal management of the office over which he presides is if anything still more deficient. Machines and materials have been loaned and presented to favorites by officials in that establishment with or without the consent of the Congressional Printer; men have been employed on account of their political influence alone, while the testimony shows their complete unfitness to earn the wages they receive; employés have been paid while absent in their respective States attending elections; records and documents have been sold on credit in violation of law; no accounts have been kept of large sums of money thus outstanding; amounts collected have been applied without crediting them upon the books of the office, and work for private parties has been executed at the Government office contrary to the express provisions of law, while in adjusting the cash on hand to the books balances have been forced and accounts falsified.

The testimony substantiates each and every of these allegations and forces your committee to the conclusion that the general management of the Government Printing Office has been of such a character as would ruin the most substantial private establishment in the country. In the investigations of your committee it became apparent that aside from the dereliction in duty, before alluded to, the Congressional Printer has, during his administration of the office, rendered himself liable to charges still graver in their nature and in contemplation of law. A stationer of Washington City stated under oath before your committee that he had sold to the Government Printer, through his foreman of binding, a quantity of blank-books which, at the instance of the purchaser, were charged as a certain amount of "cap-paper;" the foreman's requisition and receipt for the same, the check on the Treasurer of the United States signed by the Congressional Printer, stating on its face that it was issued "for paper," together with the bill for the same, are submitted with the testimony. The foreman of binding admits the transaction, and asserts that the Congressional Printer was cognizant of it. That official, however, denies all knowledge of the matter, while his financial clerk affirms that the check in question was drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States "by authority of the Congressional Printer" and signed by him in person. Your committee can see in the transaction nothing less than a successful attempt to draw money from the Treasury of the United States upon false and fraudulent vouchers.

In the second place, it appears that the Congressional Printer has received from various sources and at different times large sums of money, the exact amount of which it is impossible for your committee to ascertain, on account of the absence before alluded to of reliable books of account. During the examination of the Congressional Printer the fact incidentally transpired that he had not deposited these sums in the Treasury of the United States in the manner required by law. The clerks in charge of the sales of documents and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD each held large sums unaccounted for on the general books of the office, while the financial clerk, who is presumed to have charge of all funds collected, had, at the time of this investigation, an amount approximating $60,000 in his hands which was unaccounted for on any of the books of account.

The information derived from the books would be that every dollar received had been deposited, for the cash account submitted to your committee was balanced to a cent; and when, in addition to this, we refer to the fact that every report to Congress made by the present Congressional Printer contains language to the effect that the total amounts thus received by him during the year have been deposited in the United States Treasury, "as required by law," the conclusion of fraud becomes irresistible. According to his admissions this money thus falsely reported as deposited "has accumulated along" for fully five years, and was used and applied contrary to law. No mention is made of this sum on the books, but a single detached sheet of paper is submitted which purports to contain a list of the items which make up that amount. This paper is the only record kept in the Government Printing Office of the large sum so wrongfully accumulated, and the financial clerk assured the committee that should it be lost or mislaid it would be impossible to make an intelligible showing to account for its accumulation. He further states that this system has prevailed in the establishment for years, and that the books first submitted and sworn to as books of original entry were really no more than copies arbitrarily compiled to suit emergencies from slips similar to the one submitted with the testimony. That these accounts might be submitted to the only test which it was possible to apply, the committee employed a skillful accountant (Mr. Behlé) to make examination of the statements contained in the annual reports as compared with the facts as they appear upon the books of the United States Treasury. The result is set forth in his testimony and clearly shows that in every instance the reports upon the points in question are incorrect.

Large sums have also been allowed to remain in the hands of other clerks, one of whom opened a bank account, as agent, and deposited there moneys and funds belonging to the United States.

To recapitulate, your committee have found—

First. That the cost and charges of the work done for Congress and the Executive Departments are exorbitant and greatly in excess of what the same could be done for by private parties.

Second. That the Government Printing Office is conducted in an incompetent manner.

Third. That the cost of publishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is incorrectly reported.

Fourth. That the amount of work done for the Departments is excessive, and should be limited by law.

Fifth. That the general management by the Congressional Printer of his office is extravagant to a degree that would bankrupt any private establishment in the country.

Sixth. That he has drawn money from the United States Treasury on false vouchers.

Seventh. That he has detained and used Government moneys contrary to law.

Eighth. That money belonging to the United States has been deposited in bank in violation of law.

Before closing their report, your committee deem it their duty to submit the following correspondence. Shortly before the close of their investigation the Congressional Printer addressed the following letter to the committee:

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, April 21, 1876.

DEAR SIR: As I have been assured by your committee that I shall have the privilege of reviewing the testimony taken in the printing investigation and of introducing rebutting testimony, and as I am not versed in the laws and rules of evidence, I desire the privilege of being attended by counsel. Will you please answer if that privilege will be granted?

Very respectfully,

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

I have been suffering from sciatic rheumatism for nearly a week past, but hope to be able to get to the Capitol by Monday.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman House Committee on Printing.

Desiring to afford him every opportunity of explaining his official conduct, your committee directed the following reply to be made:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Printing to inform you that they are ready to hear the testimony of such additional witnesses as you may desire to produce. I am further instructed to say that the committee have, at your request, already examined a number of witnesses from the Government Printing Office; but, desirous that no means be left untried to arrive at the truth regarding the cost of public printing, shall be pleased to hear the statements of others. It is necessary that the investigation be brought to a close, and you will therefore bring forward your witnesses during the latter part of the present week.

You are further informed that you can examine the testimony at any time after Thursday morning at ten o'clock, in the committee-room; and the committee desire me to add that you are at liberty to bring before them any reputable member of the legal profession as counsel.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

CHAS. J. WIENER,
Clerk of the Committee.

Hon. A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Three days afterward the following letter came to hand:

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, April 27, 1876.

SIR: I desire to acknowledge the receipt of the note of your clerk under date of the 24th instant. On consultation with counsel, I am advised that, inasmuch as I am an officer of the Senate of the United States, your committee has no jurisdiction to investigate my conduct in office as Congressional Printer, and that your committee will not pretend to do so.

So far as your inquiries under the resolution of the House of Representatives are concerned, I have no special interest, and therefore I have concluded that I have no duty to perform except to give you any information in my power in regard to the subject under investigation by your committee, which I have already done.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman of House Committee on Printing.

In conclusion, your committee, after full consideration of the subject of public printing, are of the opinion that, as now executed at the Government Office, this work is costing half a million dollars annually more than it would cost if done by responsible private parties under a proper contract system; that it has cost the Government during the past seven years three and a half million dollars more to maintain the Public Printing Office than would have been required to pay for the same quantity and quality of work under private contract; that either through incompetency, negligence, or design, or all of them, abuses of various kinds have accompanied the work, adding unnecessarily to its cost; that, while these abuses might by competent and honest supervision have been prevented, it is impossible for the Government by its own direct agency either to print a book or build a ship so cheap as individual enterprise can do it; that not only has experience shown the practice to lead invariably to extravagance and corruption, but the theory which persuades the Government to enter the lists as a gigantic competitor with its own people is wrong, the several branches of industry and their honorable profits belonging by right to the people; that, in view of these several conclusions, it is wise to take immediate steps toward the discontinuance of the Public Printing Office; that in furtherance of this purpose the proposition of Franklin Rives of date May 2, 1876, for the printing and binding of the debates of Congress, should be accepted, and contract entered into to take effect with the beginning of the second session Forty-fourth Congress; that the printing and binding for the Executive Departments of the Government should be under the control of the heads thereof, with authority to contract for the same upon the most advantageous terms to be obtained through the processes of competition; that, as it is necessary to have the printing and binding ordered by the two Houses of Congress done in the city of Washington, and as at the present time there are no private establishments in this city possessing the necessary facilities for the successful and satisfactory execution of this work, it is not judicious to remove it at once from the Public Printing Office, but that the interests of the Government require its removal from that office so soon as any responsible private party with the proper facilities will undertake it upon reasonable terms; that whenever satisfactory contracts can be made for the execution of this class of work, the Public Printing Office and all the property used in connection therewith should be disposed of according to law and the proceeds returned to the Treasury of the United States.

Having thus stated the result of their investigation, your committee submit the following:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to certify to the proper authorities of the District of Columbia the testimony heretofore taken by the order of this House relating to the conduct of A. M. Clapp as Congressional Printer, to the end that he may be indicted and prosecuted.

Resolved, That the Committee on Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, is an officer who may be impeached under the Constitution of the United States, and report to the House at as early a day as practicable.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Appropriations of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to embody in the sundry civil bill to be reported by them to this House, and in which bill appropriations for public printing are made, the following sections, to wit:

SEC. —. That so much of all laws or parts of laws as provide for the election or appointment of Congressional Printer or Public Printer be, and the same are hereby, repealed, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1876, and the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a suitable person, who must be a practical printer and versed in the art of bookbinding, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office from and after the day aforesaid; he shall be called the "Government Printer," and shall be vested with all the powers and subject to all the restrictions pertaining to the officer now known as the Congressional Printer; he shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and he shall receive a salary at the rate of $3,500 a year.

SEC. —. That the amounts appropriated for printing, binding, and blank-books for the several Executive Departments shall be placed under the control of those Departments, respectively, and expended by the heads thereof; and the head of each Department shall cause to be made in the month of July, 1876, and afterward in June and December of each fiscal year, a schedule of all blanks of regular forms and blank-books, and other printing and binding required for the ensuing five months of the year 1876, and subsequently for the following six months' use in that Department, so far as it may be practicable to make such schedule, and shall take proper measures to obtain proposals from various parties for furnishing said blanks and blank-books, and for executing the said printing and binding, or any part thereof, upon paper equal in quality and weight to the present adopted standard; and he is hereby authorized and required to contract for the said blanks and blank-books, and for the said printing and binding, or any part thereof, with the lowest responsible bidder, the successful bidder to give bond in such sum as may be determined by the head of the Department ordering the work for the prompt and faithful execution of the same: Provided, That a copy of the schedule aforesaid shall be furnished by the head of each Department to the Government Printer, and he is hereby required to submit at the earliest practicable day a statement to the said head of a Department, showing the cost of executing the work named in the schedule at the Government Printing Office; and the said head of a Department shall award such work to the Government Printer when it shall be found that his estimate of the cost thereof is the lowest or as low as the lowest bid; and whenever such work is executed at the Government Printing Office, it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to furnish with each and every document, pamphlet, blank, blank-book with or without printed headings, job of printing, or job of binding thus executed a bill or memorandum setting forth the number of copies; the quantity, weight, cost, and description of paper; the number of pages, the number of thousand ems printer's measurement, the cost of composition, making-up, and imposing, proof-reading, correcting, and press-work; the cost, if any, of stereotyping, electrotyping, lithographing, or engraving, including paper and printing; the cost of dry-pressing, folding, gathering, stitching or sewing, and binding, including materials. Whenever any work requiring the purchase of materials whose value exceeds $100 is awarded to the Government Printer, he shall prepare an estimate of the quantity and cost of the same for submission to the head of the Department ordering the work, and, upon approval, bids shall be invited by the Government Printer in such manner as the head of the Department may direct, and contracts shall be awarded by the last-named officer, contracts to be made in quadruplicate, for distribution as follows: One copy to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, one copy to the Department authorizing the contract, one copy to the Government Printer, and one copy to the contractor. It shall be the duty of the Department for which the work is to be done to designate some competent person in its employ to inspect the papers delivered under any contract as to quality, quantity, and weight, and no bills arising under such contracts shall be paid except they bear the joint certificate of the Government Printer and an inspector as aforesaid, all accounts so certified and approved to be forwarded to the head of the Department authorizing the contract for payment. When the work is completed and delivered the Government Printer shall prepare an account in detail showing the cost of each item, as provided in this section, and present the same to the head of the Department for whom the work was done for payment; and, if correct, the same shall be paid in full, less the cost of the paper, by check upon the Treasurer of the United States, which check shall be immediately deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for the public printing and binding, to be drawn therefrom only upon requisition and warrant in the usual manner. Whenever the Government Printer shall complete any work which may be given him to do under the provisions of this act, he shall report to the proper Department the quantity, kind, and cost of the several papers remaining in his hands, and the same shall be held subject to the orders of the head of that Department: And provided further, That the beforenamed provisions shall also apply to the appropriations for printing and binding for the Library of Congress, and that it shall be the duty of the Librarian of Congress to issue schedules of the printing and binding required for said Library to contractors and to the Government Printer, and to have the said work done as it is in this section provided for the execution of the printing and binding for the Departments.

SEC. —. That the Government Printer shall, in his annual report to Congress, as required by existing laws, also render a detailed statement, in tabular form, setting forth the number of copies, amount, and kind of work, and the cost of each document, pamphlet, blank, or other printed matter, executed in accordance with existing laws or by order of either House of Congress, arranging the various items under appropriate headings, as follows: Title or subject of work; number of copies; number of pages; number of thousand ems printers' measurement; cost of composition, proof-reading, corrections, making-up or imposing, and press-work; cost of stereotyping or electrotyping, cost of lithographing or engraving, including paper and printing; quantity of paper used, weight, description and cost per ream; cost of dry-pressing, style of binding, cost of binding per volume, including folding, gathering, and stitching or sewing; total cost of each document, pamphlet, blank, or other printed matter; and the distribution of each.

SEC. —. That the Government Printer shall keep such a set of books as will show the complete transactions of the Government Printing Office under his direction, exhibiting the purchases of paper and other materials in detail, and the uses to which the paper and other materials so purchased have been applied, and enabling him to make the detailed statement called for in the preceding sections, both for work executed for the Departments and for Congress and the moneys paid by the several Departments for work done by their order; the said books to show the description, quantity and cost, of all materials purchased; the description and quantity thereof issued to the various departments of the Government Printing Office; the description and quantity thereof used in the various items of work executed; and the description and quantity of any paper or materials destroyed, lost, or of which fragments shall be sold. And it is made the duty of the Joint Committee on Public Printing to inspect, at least once a year, or cause to be inspected by a competent person, the books of the Government Printer, to ascertain whether they are kept in accordance with this section; and, if they are not so kept, it shall be the duty of the Joint Committee on Public Printing to certify the same through the presiding officers of their respective Houses to the President of the United States as a neglect of duty on the part of the said Government Printer, which shall be a sufficient cause for his removal from office.

SEC. —. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to pay no greater price for labor performed by printers, bookbinders, and other employés in the Government Printing Office for each hour's work or piece-work than the average price paid for an hour's work or for piece-work of the same description in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; nor shall it be lawful for him to employ any workmen not thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by a trial of their skill under his direction.

SEC. —. That whenever it becomes necessary for the Government Printer to make purchases of materials not already due under contracts, he shall prepare a schedule of the articles required, showing the description, quantity, and quality of each article, and shall invite proposals for furnishing the same either by advertisement or circular, as the Joint Committee on Public Printing may direct, and shall make contracts for the same with the lowest bidder, making a return of the same to the Joint Committee on Public Printing, showing the number of bidders, the amounts of each bid, and the awards of the contracts.

SEC. —. That section 196 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, so amended that henceforth it shall be the duty of the heads of each Executive Department, except the Department of State and the Department of Justice, to furnish the editor of the annual abridgment of the message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents with copies of the reports of the various Bureaus and other subordinate offices of their respective Departments on or before the 1st day of November of every year; and it shall be the duty of the said editor of the abridgment, acting under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to compile such portions thereof as he may deem of the greatest public interest, with an alphabetical index, and to employ such assistants and copyists as he may deem necessary for the prompt performance of the work, at a cost for compensation and additional compensation not to exceed $1,500, to be paid under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing; and it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to have the said abridgment printed and bound before the close of the month of December in which the said message shall be delivered: Provided, That while it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to print copies of the reports proper of the heads of the Executive Departments, as provided in section 3798 of the Revised Statutes, it shall not be lawful for him to print the reports of the various Bureaus and other offices of the Executive Departments, nor shall it be lawful for the heads of Departments or their subordinate officers to have the reports of Bureaus or offices printed by any one at the public expense: And provided further, That the papers relating to foreign affairs accompanying the annual message of the President of the United States shall be transmitted to the Senate in writing with the aforesaid message, and the Secretary of the Senate shall at once transmit the same to the editor of the abridgment, who shall insert in that publication such of said papers as he may deem of public interest not exceeding the amount of fifty printed pages; and the publication of the annual volume of papers relating to foreign affairs be, and the same is hereby, discontinued.

SEC. — That from and after the close of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress the printing and binding of the proceedings and debates of Congress, in the same form as they now appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, shall be done by Franklin Rives, of Washington City, for the period of six years next ensuing, terminable after notice of two years on the part of either party, terminating at the expiration of a Congress, upon the terms stated in his proposal, to wit: Two and one-half mills per printed page of book edition, and seventy cents per volume for binding; the type to be of the same kinds as now used in printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the pages to be made up of the same size as those of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the paper to be of the same description, weight, and quality as that now used for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the volumes to be as nearly as practicable of the same size and bound in the same style as the volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the stereotype plates or duplicates thereof to belong to the United States, the above-named sum of two and a half mills per printed page and seventy cents per volume for binding to embrace all charges made by the said Franklin Rives for the printing, binding, delivery, and all other work connected with the prompt publication of the proceedings and debates of Congress in daily and book form, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now published, and for the said stereotype plates: Provided, That the said Franklin Rives shall enter into good and sufficient bonds, in the sum of $100,000, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the faithful and prompt performance of his contract.

SEC. —. That it shall not be lawful for any printing or binding, other than that for Congress or for the Executive Departments, to be executed at the Government Printing Office; and all branch or other printing offices or binderies (except the printing office at the headquarters of the Signal Service Corps) now in the various Departments or Bureaus thereof, be abolished; and that it be the duty of the Government Printer to have all the materials belonging to the United States in the said printing offices and binderies transferred to the Government Printing Office, and that it be unlawful to have any printing or binding executed in any Department or Bureau thereof.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

PAPERS REFERRED TO IN THE REPORT.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1876.

SIR: I beg leave to submit to your honorable committee a proposal for printing the debates of Congress, in the form of a contract, to be used in case of the acceptance of the proposal.

In making this proposal I desire to call the attention of your committee and of Congress to some of the reasons which seem to justify and even to necessitate a change in the present mode of printing the debates, which since March, 1873, have been printed by the Government at its public office. Up to the time when the work was taken from the hands of the proprietors of the Globe, the debates had been published by John C. Rives, the founder of the Globe, and by his successors, in a manner which left nothing to be desired. The work was acknowledged by all to be unequaled, unrivaled, and in all respects perfect. The only change suggested by any one was in the cost of the publication. It was claimed by some that it could be as well done by the Government Printing Office for less money. Prudent statesmen doubted the propriety of the proposed change, both as a matter of economy and as a matter of justice to those who had so long executed the work with fidelity, with only such profit as its excellence justified, and who had invested in it all their capital on the faith of its continuance. These friends of the Globe knew well that "there is no work so costly as that which the Government does for itself." This they knew from observation and experience. In the debates which took place in the Senate in February, 1869, Senator ANTHONY, then and now chairman of the Senate Printing Committee, spoke of "the deduction that must always be made for Government work in competition with private work." "It always costs more," said he. Three years later, when the subject was again considered in the Senate, he said: "It is my opinion now that we cannot profitably carry the publication of the Globe to the Government Printing Office." It is to be regretted that he was afterward led to express a different opinion, which experience has not justified.

In the debates in the Senate in February, 1869, Senators FRELINGHUYSEN, MORRILL of Vermont, Fessenden, Hendricks, and MORTON expressed the opinion that it is the interest of the Government to undertake as few jobs as possible; that instead of making, as was promised, $40,000 a year by printing the debates at its office, the Government would lose $50,000; and that, as nothing is more deceptive than public estimates, and as the private contractors who had done the work could judge best what it could be done for, the Government would find the proposed change a very costly one, at the same time that it would seriously injure faithful public servants. In these opinions as to the cost of the work, Mr. Defrees, the predecessor of the present Congressional Printer, concurred. How far such opinions have been confirmed by experience I am content to leave to your committee to judge. I believe that the investigation made by the Printing Committee of the House in 1874 showed such gross neglect on the part of the Congressional Printer in all his work and such misrepresentations as to the cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Congress might then, with profit to the Government, have taken from him the printing of the debates and restored it to the old private contractors. Such was not the conclusion of the House Printing Committee, but I am led to believe that the recent investigation made by your committee has resulted in showing that the RECORD has cost the Government far more than the Globe, and that this fact has only been concealed by the misrepresentations and omissions of the Congressional Printer, who, by neglecting to obey the law requiring him to keep and to publish yearly separate and exact accounts in detail of the cost of the RECORD, and by omitting from his partial accounts innumerable items of expense incurred in the publication, has willfully misled Congress by causing them to believe that the Government saved money by intrusting him with the work.

I will not consume time by attempting to detail the facts which sustain my assertions, inasmuch as the committee are in possession of these facts, and are well aware of the truth of the statement, which I now make, that the Government has lost at least $100,000 in testing the question whether its public agents could print the debates more cheaply than its well-tried private contractors. I will only add that, if again intrusted with the printing of the debates, I will do the work in such a manner as to prove myself worthy of the renewal of the confidence of the Government.

The proposed contract, now submitted, is substantially the same as that proposed by Rives & Bailey in 1874.

Very respectfully,

FRANKLIN RIVES.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman of the Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

This agreement, entered into this —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord 1876, by and between Franklin Rives, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, of the first part, and the United States of America, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, acting under and by virtue of the act of the —— day of ——, A. D. 1876, of the second part, witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the money hereinafter agreed to be paid unto him, does hereby covenant and agree with the said party of the second part as follows, namely:

First. To print the debates of Congress in the Daily Globe, on the morning following the day on which they occur, in the same form in which they have heretofore been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, using the same kinds of type, the same measure, and the same quality of paper as have heretofore been used in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in season to be sent from Washington by the earliest mails leaving on the morning of its issue when the matter shall not exceed fifty pages, and when the matter shall exceed fifty pages the publication of such excess may be deferred until the said party of the first part, using all due diligence, shall find its publication practicable; and the printing of all speeches not delivered in extenso in either House may be deferred until their publication shall not extend the measure of the work beyond the said fifty pages: Provided, That the copy is supplied by the official reporters of the two Houses within such reasonable time as is necessary to enable the printers to put it into type; and any such failure on the part of said reporters shall place no responsibility therefor upon the said party of the first part.

Second. To transfer the proceedings from the Daily Globe to the Congressional Globe, in the same quarto form, and to print the same on paper of the same weight and quality as that heretofore used in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Third. To compile and supply an ample index to the Congressional Globe.

Fourth. To furnish to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress two copies of the Daily Globe.

Fifth. To furnish to Congress for the use of its members ten thousand four hundred (10,400) copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, of which number —— shall be for the Senate and —— shall be for the House of Representatives.

Sixth. To bind the Congressional Globe and Appendix in volumes of the average thickness of the past volumes of that publication, in the same style as that in which they have heretofore been bound at the Government Printing Office and in the same quality of material and workmanship.

Seventh. To allow members of each House the option of receiving copies of the Daily Globe as issued, instead of bound copies of the book edition, and to mail such copies of the Daily Globe without charge for mailing.

Eighth. To deliver the bound books to the folding-rooms of the Senate and House of Representatives.

And the United States, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, acting under and by virtue of the authority aforesaid, do hereby agree with the said party of the first part to pay him for the work hereinbefore specified to be done at the following rates, namely: For all proper service connected with the printing of the debates and the furnishing of the hereinbefore specified number of copies of the two editions, at the rate of two and one-half mills per printed page of the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and for all proper service connected with the binding and delivery of the books, as hereinbefore specified, at the rate of seventy cents per volume; which rates are to cover all charges by the said party of the first part against the United States for the work hereby contracted to be done.

All accounts arising under this agreement for work done for the Senate shall be audited by its Secretary and all accounts for work done for the House of Representatives shall be audited by the Clerk thereof, or by their respective and duly-authorized attorneys, at the request of the party of the first part, as the work progresses; and whenever said accounts shall have been so audited they shall be paid by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury. This contract shall continue for at least six years from the date hereof, and shall terminate only upon a two-years notification for that purpose, which may be given by either party hereto, provided that such termination shall take effect only at the expiration of a Congress.

In testimony whereof the parties aforesaid have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals this —— day of ——, A. D. 1876.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I move that the report be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3432) to repeal section 3 of the act to provide for the resumption of specie payments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HALL.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3433) for the relief of William Hall, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to make a personal explanation.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DURHAM. As the explanation I desire to make will take some time, I have no objection to giving way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications.

ABSENCE OF OFFICERS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in accordance with the request of Hon. C. D. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 13, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of moving that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the post-office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is entitled to the floor this morning for a personal explanation.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a personal explanation.

Mr. KNOTT. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DURHAM. Two or three gentlemen have asked me to yield to them to introduce bills and other matters, and I am willing to do so.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE WYLIE.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit a report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred two memorials of Albert Grant requesting an investigation into the official conduct of Andrew Wylie, respectfully report that they have given the memorialist a partial hearing, from which it appears that a thorough investigation into the subject of the complaint will require the understanding of several quite complicated suits in equity and the examination of a considerable number of witnesses. The committee have formed no opinion whatever of the merits of Mr. Grant's charges; they are satisfied that they cannot examine them so as to do justice to the petitioner or to the judge without devoting more time to the investigation than they can spare from the other numerous and important duties already assigned to them by the House. They therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the matter, and that the same be referred to a special committee.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to a special committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DURHAM. I will yield for a moment to one or two gentlemen who desire to introduce matters before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee on Appropriations is very anxious to finish the post-office appropriation bill, and I think we ought to have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW,] who is about to leave for New Orleans, desires to submit some reports from his committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to that.

CORA A. SLOCOMB AND OTHERS.

Mr. NEW, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3434) for the relief of Cora A. Slocomb, Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline Urquhart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

STATE EXPENSES IN THE REBELLION.

Mr. NEW also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2420) to re-imburse the States for expenses incurred in the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

TREATY WITH MEXICO.

Mr. LITTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 113) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce with the republic of Mexico can be arranged; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS B. M'CLEWEE.

On motion of Mr. EDEN, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Thomas B. McClewee, for cotton and freight, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask the Clerk to read the passage marked in the paper which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Judge M. J. DURHAM, the present Representative in Congress from this district, is perfectly cognizant of the truth of this accusation. If put upon the witness-stand, he would be compelled, reluctantly of course, to convict Fitzhugh of perjury. I have been amazed for several months that he has countenanced or acquiesced in the imposition of such a creature upon his House, upon the party, and upon the country. This amazement is not confined to myself. In the opinion of many other friends of the judge it is now entirely in order that he should rise in his seat and explain.

W. G. WELCH.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, the sentence just read is the close of a long article I find in the Louisville Daily Courier-Journal of May 5, and copied in the National Republican of yesterday. The preceding part of the article speaks of the indictments against Colonel Fitzhugh, the present Doorkeeper of this House, his trial and acquittal; that the negro Tom Scott had sued in the Federal court certain parties who he alleged had maltreated him; that Colonel Fitzhugh was sworn as a witness on the trial of the case; that he had sworn falsely in twelve particulars, &c.

Now, I am cognizant of the facts spoken of by Mr. Welch thus far, to wit, that Colonel Fitzhugh was indicted for three offenses spoken of by him; he was tried and acquitted of each and all of them, as stated by him. I was one of his counsel in the cases. Tom Scott, the negro spoken of by Mr. Welch, sued the parties named by him in the Federal court, and recovered judgment against all of them except Dr. Dunlap. Colonel Fitzhugh was sworn as a witness for said Scott. I was summoned and sworn as a witness also in the case. We were both examined as to some matters occurring during the investigation of the charges against Colonel Fitzhugh. In some of these we differed, to what extent and what were the points of difference I cannot now remember, but they were regarded as material in the trial of the case. I then remembered them with distinctness, and thought Colonel Fitzhugh's statements were incorrect where we differed.

I should state further that in consequence of sickness in my family I did not reach Washington until Monday morning the day the House was organized, the democratic caucus at which Colonel Fitzhugh was nominated for Doorkeeper having been held on the Saturday evening previous, and I did not know that he was a candidate for the position until after he was nominated. Had I been in the city before the caucus was held, and had known his name would have been presented, I should have communicated these facts to those who were pressing his claims, that they might have judged as to the propriety or impropriety of his nomination.

I will state further that I had no personal acquaintance with Colonel Fitzhugh until I was employed to defend him in said charges; but, as is stated by Mr. Welch, he was generally popular in the community where he lived.

Messrs. Welch, Dunlap, Jones, Shannon, and all the parties sued by Tom Scott were gentlemen of good standing and high respectability, and that community, knowing them and Colonel Fitzhugh and knowing what occurred at all these trials, have made up their judgment as to the real guilt or innocence of the parties implicated.

I make these statements not for those who know the facts where they occurred, but that the members of this House and others may see how much I know of the matters stated in the article just read and how far I have been connected with them. I have heretofore explained these matters frequently to members who have asked me in regard thereto.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of privilege. [Laughter.] I ask for the reading of the passage marked in the article which I send to the Clerk's desk; but before the Clerk begins to read it I will, with the permission of the House, ask to have printed the newspaper article which I hold in my hand, which is the subject upon which I propose to found a resolution. It is the first part of the article which my colleague [Mr. DURHAM] has just had read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks to have printed in the RECORD a newspaper slip which he sends to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WHITE. These are the charges, and I ask to have them read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Charges against whom?

Mr. WHITE. Charges against the Doorkeeper of the House. The article which I ask to have read has appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal and was written by Mr. Welch, who I understand is chairman of the democratic committee in that county, and is certainly good authority with gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. EDEN. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] says that he rises to a question of privilege. Is there objection to the printing of the article in the RECORD? [Cries of "Object."]

Mr. WHITE. Then I shall ask that the whole thing be read if gentlemen object to my proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that this is not a question of privilege. It does not relate to the privileges of any member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot say whether the member from Kentucky is involved in this matter or not until it is read.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to explain.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not relate to the member.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The gentleman has himself disclaimed that there is any question of the privileges of a member in what he brings before the House; if it did relate to the privilege of a member he would be in order, but not otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not come within the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It relates to an officer of the House, and the Chair will hear the paper read, and after it has been read the question will be determined.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman has anything to submit affecting the character of an officer of the House which requires the action of the House——

Mr. WHITE. I have a resolution to submit.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman states that it involves the character of an officer of the House.

Mr. WHITE. If I could have my preference, I would ask that the articles be printed in the RECORD without being read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD these newspaper articles without their being read?

Mr. RANDALL. I object, because they do not pertain to any matter connected with the business of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Clerk will read the articles. If it is a matter connected with the organization of the House, or affecting the character of an officer of the House, the Chair has no alternative but to direct the Clerk to read the articles.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand the gentleman to say that the matter relates to himself or to any other member of the House. If he chooses to make an accusation against an officer of the House it will be all right, and this House will not shrink from the investigation of it. But I do object to newspaper articles being incorporated into the RECORD.

Mr. LUTTRELL. We have all read these articles time and time again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule on the subject of questions of privilege:

A matter of privilege arising out of any question, or from a quarrel between two members, or any other cause, supersedes the consideration of the original question, and must be first disposed of. [According to the practice, not finally disposed of, but the House shall proceed to such immediate measures as it may think proper.] Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition, he must entertain it in preference to any other business. [Such opinion, of course, being subject to an appeal.] And when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House, it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing to go farther than the rule, and to say that anything that relates to an officer of this House should be considered by the House; but I do object to the insertion in the RECORD of entire columns of newspaper articles. I am willing that the resolution may be read for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must rule that it is a question of privilege, if it connects itself with an officer of the House.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Clerk to read the preamble and resolution together with the newspaper articles I have sent to his desk.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas the following articles which affect the character of an officer of this House have appeared in the public prints, [the articles were not read:] Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the charges publicly made against L. H. Fitzhugh, Doorkeeper of the House, and report by resolution or otherwise whether there is anything in said charges that would render him an improper person to be an officer of this House; and that they be further directed to inquire into the propriety of abolishing the office of Doorkeeper and requiring the duties of said office to be performed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. GLOVER. I offer the following as a substitute.

Mr. WHITE. I have not yielded the floor, and do not propose to yield until the articles referred to in the preamble are read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] will not insist upon that. I presume every gentleman in the House has read the articles, and time is very valuable to us now.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman does not insist upon these articles being read if you will allow them to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. Why encumber the RECORD with them?

Mr. LUTTRELL. What propriety is there in taking up every newspaper article and printing it in the record of the debates of this House?

Mr. BLAND. If debate is not in order, why is the reading of a newspaper article in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to make this article a part of his remarks.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If he makes the article a part of his remarks it is not to be read, but merely printed as a part of his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is very often the case that the Clerk reads a document, or article, or extract for a gentleman addressing the House as a part of his remarks. The Clerk will proceed to read the article referred to.

The Clerk began the reading, but before concluding,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I ask that there be consent given to have this article printed in the RECORD without reading, in order to save the time of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman know that we can reach the result desired without having the article printed? And does he not know also that this printing will involve a large expenditure of money?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] has a right to have it read, and I make the proposition to print without reading in order to save time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that that will be agreed to. Gentlemen should bear in mind that it is seldom any member has ever asked to have such a body of matter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE. I object to this interruption, and ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading.

The Clerk resumed the reading, but had not concluded when

Mr. HOLMAN said: This is a very voluminous document, and under the rules of the House the gentleman has the power to compel us to hear this paper read. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading, so as to save the time of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We tried to have that done last night, in the case of a much longer document, and objection was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing in the RECORD of these newspaper articles without further reading?

Objection was made.

The Clerk again resumed and concluded the reading of the following article:

The disposition to investigate the characters of public officers has extended within the last few weeks to the offices of the House of Representatives, five having been made to walk the plank, and the following transcript of official documents on file in the several courts of justice would rather seem to indicate that the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, in addition to having served in the rebel army and having been sergeant-at-arms of the rebel senate, has been varying his occupation since the war, and from Kentucky and Texas, where he last hails from, has left a trail which, were it not for the following papers, it would be difficult to believe that the House of Representatives had been so shamefully imposed upon. The witnesses of these various crimes are about twenty; the offenses were committed at various times and places. The last indictment for perjury explains how he escaped the penitentiary for his previous offenses. His two sons, James and John, appear to have participated in the case of arson and larceny. Both are now in the employ of the House, or, rather, on its pay-rolls. It is only within a few days that these facts have come to the surface here. Whether the House can afford to make an issue with this representative of the democratic masses remains to be seen:

Commonwealth indictment for grand larceny against L. H. Fitzhugh et al.; a true bill—H. Roberts, foreman; April 22, 1871, filed: W. H. Miller, clerk; witnesses examined: D. W. Jones, A. Q. Payne, John Freeland, and J. R. Shannon.

Extract from deposition of Thomas F. Purnell, United States marshal of Texas, showing attempted black-mail; L. H. Fitzhugh, Doorkeeper of the United States House of Representatives.

Within four or five days after Mr. Peyton arrived in Austin I saw him in conference with Mr. Fitzhugh, of that place, and on the next day Mrs. Fitzhugh sent a message to my wife, requesting her to call upon her (Mrs. Fitzhugh) at her residence. Although she had had no acquaintance whatever with Mrs. Fitzhugh or her family, Mrs. Purnell complied with the request. Upon her arrival Mrs. Fitzhugh, with only a few preliminary words, unblushingly said that Mr. Peyton, a relative of her husband, from Norfolk, Virginia, was in the city to make an investigation of my office; that she was authorized to make this proposition to Mr. Purnell: That if she (Mrs. Purnell) would secure to them a sum of money sufficient to make it an object they would guarantee that Mr. Peyton would not make an adverse report of the affairs of my office. To this proposition Mrs. Purnell indignantly replied that my integrity must stand or fall by the investigation; that I only asked a fair investigation into the affairs of my office; that I did not rely upon the influence of powerful friends, but altogether upon this investigation to vindicate me. And she left Mrs. Fitzhugh at once and made known to me the facts of this interview. I thereupon requested her to take our son and call upon Mr. Peyton and inform him of all that had occurred. When she reached the hotel she sent up her card from the parlor to Mr. Peyton, who, instead of descending to the parlor to see her, sent word for her to come up to his room, and she was thus compelled to go with her son to Mr. Peyton's room, where she found Mr. Britton, who after some delay reluctantly left. In the presence of her son she informed Mr. Peyton of all that had occurred at Mrs.

Fitzhugh's. Mr. Peyton treated the matter with levity, and said he knew but little of Mrs. Fitzhugh. * * *

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS F. PURNELL,
United States Marshal Western District of Texas.

This answer is made by me away from my papers, but, to the best of my knowledge, recollection, and belief, is true in every respect.

THOMAS F. PURNELL.

Sworn to before me this 23d day of November, 1875.

DAVID THOMSON,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Clerk to read also an extract from the New York Tribune of May 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Doorkeeper Fitzhugh's experience—Attentions from Representatives after his election—The rush for positions—Pleasures of the office.

Mr. L. H. Fitzhugh, Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, gives, in a letter sent to a friend living at Sherman, Texas, in December last, an interesting description of the pains and pleasures of persons newly elected to an office by the House. Below will be found a verbatim copy of his letter:

D. C., Decr. 15, 1875.

DEAR —: I have been trying ever since my election to write to you but have been besieged from light in the morning until one or two at night. I had about one hundred & thirty appointments to make & have had I reckon without exageration three thousand applications besides men women & children pulling & jurking me every time I would put my head out of the door of my office. I have had to keep two ushers & two to three clerks ever since the hour of my election in my office, & it is now five O'clock in the morning that I have gotten up to write write to you. In regard to — I tried to save a place for him but the members are so clamerous for their constituants that so fur it has been impossible to do so, my force after christmas will be increased and then I will be able to do something for him & I will stick him in. Fay (Fitzhugh's son) arrived on Saturday morning all safe. I set him to work on Monday at a $2,100 place & he is the most delighted fellow you ever saw. [The reading of the foregoing was frequently interrupted by laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state in confirmation of his ruling that the various categories under which questions of privilege come up are enumerated on pages 185, 186, and 187 of Barclay's Digest; and Cushing, on pages 582 and 583, gives in the list of questions of privilege "questions relating to the conduct of persons in the employment of the House." It is clear, therefore, that the Chair is bound to entertain this as a question of privilege.

Mr. WHITE. I have had no doubt of that all the time.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to remind the Chair that the Speaker ruled exactly the same way two or three weeks ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thanks the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for the suggestion. The Chair also finds in Barclay, page 186, the following:

When a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House, it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

So that the responsibility of entertaining this question is shared by the House with the Chair.

Mr. WHITE. I now ask the Clerk to read an article that appeared in the Louisville Courier-Journal of May 5, over the name of one Mr. Welch, who I understand is at this time the chairman of the democratic county committee of Lincoln County, Kentucky. If he is not at the present time he has been, as I am reliably informed. This article, written over his own name, has reference to the matters already read. I ask that it be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be printed.

Mr. WHITE. I am willing that it shall be printed without the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading, and printing the article in the RECORD?

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. WHITE. Then I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Fitzhugh case—A statement prejudicial to the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives—An old feud revived.

[To the editor of the Courier-Journal.]

STANFORD, KENTUCKY, April 29, 1876.

In to-day's issue of your paper is printed an account of an interview of one of your reporters with Mr. T. W. Bullitt, of Louisville, in relation to certain charges recently published in the Chicago Inter-Ocean against L. H. Fitzhugh, the present Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives. Mr. Bullitt, who was Fitzhugh's attorney, is represented as saying, in effect, that these charges of arson, of perjury, and of larceny were utterly without foundation, and that the most serious one, that of arson, was based solely upon the alleged confession of Thomas Scott, a negro, whose confession was extorted by the threats and violence of a mob, and promptly retracted by him as soon as he was placed under the protection of the law. Further inquiry upon the part of the reporter in the United States district court at Louisville discloses the names of the persons who composed this "mob." These are D. W. Jones, an avowed personal enemy of Fitzhugh, Messrs. Shannon, Dunlap, Gilkerson, Higgins, and Alexander, and the writer of this communication, all of whom were sued in the United States court by Thomas Scott for damages, and against all of whom, except Dr. Dunlap, a judgment was obtained by the plaintiff. In brief, the unmistakable purport of the entire article is to the effect that Fitzhugh was merely the victim of a persecution set on foot and directed by personal enmity.

I had a very unpleasant, and I may add a very unprofitable, connection with the affair out of which these charges grew. I retain a very distinct recollection of the facts of the case. I should not have dreamed, however, at this late day, of making any public ado about them, but for the publication of which I have spoken, in which by inevitable inference I am made to appear a party to a dishonorable conspiracy to effect the ruin of an innocent man. Since the organization of the present House of Representatives I have several times been solicited to furnish information concerning Fitzhugh to parties at Washington. I have uniformly declined for the reason that the parties applying for such information desired it, as I conceived, for the purpose either of manufacturing party capital, or of blackmailing Fitzhugh. I preferred that any investigation of his antecedents should originate with the party which gave him his position, and I was quite content that, so long as he held his office, he should enjoy all its emoluments without any molestation from me. I am not sorry, however, to have so proper and justifiable an occasion for saying to the public, of his attorney's own selection, all I know in reference to these charges against Fitzhugh—in honoring whom last winter the democratic party conceived that it was displaying an appropriate recognition of the South and her former soldiers. I propose, by your leave, to do so now, with perfect frankness and as briefly as I may, "naught extenuating nor setting down aught in malice." Before beginning it may not be improper to say, lest I may be suspected of political prejudice or party design, that I was a confederate soldier in the late war, and have ever since been a democrat.

On the night of the 4th of February, 1871, the principal hotel at the Crab Orchard Springs in this (Lincoln) county, a large and valuable frame building, was burned to the ground. The fire originated in a china-closet, almost beneath the rooms of the family of D. W. Jones, one of the proprietors. It was a room rarely visited at that season of the year, in which no fire was used, and which was perfectly empty at the time of the fire. Without going into the detailed evidences of the fact, the fire was unquestionably the work of an incendiary. Who did it? The community was naturally aroused and excited. But of all the community, D. W. Jones alone suspected Fitzhugh. They had been partners in conducting the hotel. They had not gotten along agreeably. Fitzhugh had, only a week before, been finally forced out of the business. He was very indignant against Jones, and believed he had been outrageously treated. I was attorney for one of the parties, familiar with all the circumstances, and thought myself he had been dealt with harshly and ungenerously. Mr. Jones made no secret of his suspicions. They were laughed at by everybody. Fitzhugh was popular. He had been at the place two years. He was a smiling, courteous, well-looking fellow, free-handed with his money, connected by birth and marriage with the best blood of Virginia and Kentucky, and had belonged during the war to that devoted band of "colonels" who lived generously, on mysterious incomes, at Richmond, Augusta, Columbus, and where not, and, far from the disturbing smell of "villainous saltpeter," gave to the armies in front the incalculable benefit of their counsel and criticism. I was a resident of Crab Orchard, and was on friendly, perhaps I should say cordial terms with the "colonel," and believed him utterly incapable of a dishonorable action. He had brought with him from Virginia the negro man Tom Scott, who was at the time of the fire a servant at the hotel. About a week after some negroes told me that Scott certainly knew something about the origin of the fire. Other evidences had already directed suspicion toward him. Four young gentlemen of the village, of steady habits and high character, determined to interview him at night, and endeavor to elicit the truth. They were all friendly to Fitzhugh, and were certain that Tom's disclosures, if he made any, could not affect him, but, on the contrary, would put a quietus upon Jones's suspicions. At their request I accompanied them.

It was solemnly stipulated, before starting on what we all felt to be a very questionable enterprise, that in no event should any personal harm be done the negro. He was to be led to believe that it was a "Ku-Klux" party, and, if he had any dying speech to make, we were prepared to hear it. No intimation was to be given him as to what he was suspected of. If he made any confession, it was to be on his own motion and without any prompting from us. This stipulation was rigidly observed. Scott was easily circumvented in the suburbs of the town, and, being led beneath a convenient and ominous tree, fell upon his knees and made a confession which startled the whole party. In substance it was this: that Fitzhugh had a week before the fire left the springs for Shelbyville wild with rage against Jones and Shannon, the owners of the property; that before leaving he had begged, bullied, and bribed him (Tom) to burn the buildings; that he consented to do so; that full instructions as to time and place of firing were subsequently sent him by Fitzhugh, and that he executed them to the letter. This unexpected denouement astounded his captors. We felt that we had an elephant on our hands. After some mummery, designed to gain time and to deepen the impression upon Thomas's mind that his end was at hand, he was cross-examined rigidly and minutely for an hour or more. It only strengthened his story, which dove-tailed exactly with every outlying and trivial circumstance connected with it. It was more consistent with itself and with every fact which we ourselves knew or afterward ascertained than any testimony I ever heard. With what he believed to be his dying breath he solemnly affirmed the absolute truth of all he had said. If it were fabricated by him to suit our supposed wishes, then is Thomas Scott even more a miracle of genius and nerve than he is of mendacity. It was impossible for us to escape the conviction that he had told us only the exact truth, and that conviction, reluctantly accepted, has only deepened with the lapse of time. After his confession the negro was told that no violence was intended him nor should be done him; a formal apology was made for any inconvenience he had been subjected to. He was taken back to town, officers Higgins and Alexander awakened, and he placed in their charge. Mr. Bullitt is misinformed as to the time of Scott's recantation. The remainder of that night and the next day he persisted in repeating his confession to his guards, although warned by them not to do so. He sent for Mr. Shannon, and begged and obtained permission, for the ease of his conscience, to tell it all over once more. He stuck to it when in jail at the county seat. And in point of fact there was at that time actually more danger to him of mob violence from persisting in his story than from denying it. So far as I have ever heard, he never retracted his confession until his case (this being before the negro-testimony bill) was removed to the United States court at Louisville, and he was induced by somebody to indict and sue in that court the parties whose names are given by your reporter. These measures were adopted, I had reason to know, for the sole benefit of Jones, Shannon, and Dunlap, neither of whom had any more connection with the alleged lynching than Parson Newman or Dr. Faustus.

A year or so after this Fitzhugh was tried on indictments for larceny, perjury, and arson. In the first two cases, the court, as I remember it, instructed peremptorily to acquit, for the technical reasons that a partner could not commit larceny upon partnership goods, and that the alleged false swearing was merely to a formal affidavit for a continuance. I must say, however, that I don't believe he was really guilty of these charges. In the arson case, owing to the loss of Scott's testimony, who had long since been reconstructed, the evidence was altogether circumstantial. It was amply strong enough to have corroborated Scott, but not complete enough of itself to warrant conviction. The court, however, refused a peremptory instruction, and gave the case to the jury, who acquitted. Whether or not it was an "honorable acquittal" they omitted to state in the verdict.

Strangely enough, after Fitzhugh leaves the county, and after Scott had exerted all his might and main and with singular success, to ruin his former employer's reputation, it is Fitzhugh who furnishes him bail, Fitzhugh who takes him back into his employment, and Fitzhugh who is his chief friend, backer, and witness in the trial for damages in the United States court. I shall not attempt to specify the multifarious iniquities of this proceeding, which the court was pleased to call a trial. Suffice it to say that after the testimony was in, some portions of which raised Mr. Dunlap's venerable hair on end and expanded his eyes to the size of dinner-plates, and after several charges by the court, which were characteristic and infamous, the jury—a truly loyal one—found the verdict which the Courier-Journal reporter has exhumed from its four years' burial. L. H. Fitzhugh, in that solemn farce, was the principal witness for the plaintiff. His entire testimony was a tissue of deliberate, willful, and unblushing falsehoods. I say this advisedly and without any malice whatever toward the "colonel" and Doorkeeper. I even regret that the truth of history and the exigencies of this controversy, to which I am no volunteer, compel me to say it of him. It is unnecessary at present, and would be tedious, to give the details of his testimony. I remember to have made a note of twelve essential and material particulars in which it was false. The unsophisticated may think it strange that the victims of his perjury did not prosecute him, but they will please to remember that the court in which it was committed, and in which alone it could be punished, was not wont to scrutinize false-swearing too closely if only it was done on the proper side of the issue.

Judge M. J. DURHAM, the present Representative in Congress from this district, is perfectly cognizant of the truth of this accusation. If put upon the witness-stand he would be compelled, reluctantly, of course, to convict Fitzhugh of perjury. I have been amazed for several months that he has countenanced, or acquiesced in, the imposition of such a creature upon his House, upon the party, and upon the country. This amazement is not confined to myself. In the opinion of many other friends of the judge, it is now entirely in order that he should rise in his seat and explain.

W. G. WELCH.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I have no ill-feeling against the Doorkeeper of this House; but I think that when such charges as these are circulating all over the country through the public press it is our duty to investigate them; and if the present Doorkeeper be guilty as charged he should be dismissed. I have introduced resolutions heretofore in regard to certain officers of this House; but they seem to be sleeping in the committee-room. I hope that this resolution, if adopted, will not be allowed to sleep in that way. I ask the House to hear the resolution again read and then to adopt it; and, when it has been adopted, I ask the committee to report, if the present Doorkeeper be such a man as is here pictured to us, that he be dismissed.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. WHITE. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to say a word before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. WHITE. I will yield to the gentleman. How much time does he wish to occupy?

Mr. REAGAN. Only a moment. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as Mr. Fitzhugh hails from Texas, I feel it due to the House that some of the members from that State should say a word at this time; and perhaps it is as proper that I should do so as any other member, as I was active in securing his election as Doorkeeper of the House. If the motion had been made to dismiss Mr. Fitzhugh from the service of the House for the imprudent and foolish letter which he wrote, I should have thought the shortest and most appropriate way to dispose of the matter would have been to adopt such a resolution. But the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] makes criminal charges against Mr. Fitzhugh; and I understand from him that, whatever he might have done as to resigning upon a suggestion in relation to his imprudent letter, he cannot resign with these criminal charges against him without an implied assent to their truth; and hence he desires an investigation of those charges. So I understand him. That is just and right. The charges are very grave. If they are true, it is our misfortune and his; but, if they are not true, he is entitled to a vindication by a committee of this House.

In reference to the charges I desire to say a few words. The writer of the letter which has been read is obliged, in order to make good the charges in his view, to criminate the United States court that tried the case. It is unfortunate for the writer, whether his charges be true or not, that he cannot make them out without charging criminality upon the court that tried the case, the district court of the United States. Therefore, so far as that is concerned, this is simply an appeal from the United States district court to Congress for a retrial of those criminal charges.

I suppose that Mr. Fitzhugh, like all others, could not control the fact that charges were made against him. The court and the jury, after considering those charges, decided in his favor; but they are repeated, very much to the annoyance of many of us who did not know of them. In this connection I deem it due to the House for me to say that as to the charges of criminality, while I have known Mr. Fitzhugh more or less for a number of years, (though not intimately,) I had never heard of them until the last two or three weeks, and knew nothing of them.

However I might have believed him to be innocent on his own statement if I had known he was charged with such an offense, I desire to say for myself, (and I think in doing it I speak for each of my colleagues,) I would not have consented to the nomination or election of any gentleman against whom such a charge had been formally made in a court of the country although we might have believed him innocent. I feel it is due to our delegation and to this House the statement should be made on our behalf that we did not know of the existence of such charges at any time against Mr. Fitzhugh. After Mr. Fitzhugh's foolish letter had been published it was perhaps proper to desire him to resign, as I felt, in common with other members, that it was offensive to the sense and dignity of this House; but as the matter now stands, since criminal charges have been made against him, I trust the resolution will be adopted, a committee appointed, and prompt, thorough investigation of those charges made.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to say a word?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to say to the House that if the previous question is voted down, I shall then present a resolution which I now hold in my hand and ask for its adoption.

Mr. WHITE. Let it be read for information.

Mr. GLOVER. If the House wishes to have information about it I will send it up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly; I agree to that.

Mr. GLOVER. Before the resolution is read I desire to say that I have had it in my possession for several days seeking an opportunity to introduce it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that L. H. Fitzhugh is not a proper person to hold the honorable and responsible position of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the United States, and that the said Fitzhugh as Doorkeeper be, and is hereby, dismissed forthwith from that office.

Mr. WHITE. I am willing to accept that as a substitute for my resolution.

Mr. GLOVER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he accepts it as a substitute?

Mr. WHITE. I do.

Mr. REAGAN. I would have agreed with the gentleman from Missouri in that resolution before the other resolution was presented, but inasmuch as there is now a resolution charging crime upon Mr. Fitzhugh I trust it will not be insisted upon; that we will not undertake here to convict Mr. Fitzhugh of crime without giving him a trial. I would be glad to have the other resolution withdrawn if this is to come before the House.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, who proposes to offer the resolution just read, that if such a resolution be adopted by the House it ought expressly to assign the reason which induced its adoption. As I understand it, here are charges of a grave criminal character made against this gentleman which he denies. He has been acquitted of some of them by a court, and of none of them, if I understand correctly the statement which has been made, has he been convicted. Now, justice to him requires the House should take no action which would seem even to imply belief in these charges without an investigation. On the other hand, I understand from the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] the writing of that letter is substantially admitted by the officer, and I suppose nobody can doubt the author of such a letter, whether it is simply folly or otherwise, is not a fit person to be Doorkeeper of this House. The Doorkeeper of the House is intrusted with its secrets, and in the course of public business it may often happen that most important matters of the House the House will desire to keep secret. The Doorkeeper of the House has, too, very much power of affecting, unless he is a man of firmness, of integrity and sense, of affecting the course of legislation. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that in justice to this officer he should say in his resolution that the House, after hearing the letter read and without forming any opinion of any matter whatever, comes to the conclusion he recites.

Mr. SINGLETON rose.

Mr. WHITE. I have offered to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ODELL.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield the balance of his time?

Mr. WHITE. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three minutes.

Mr. WHITE. Then I must demand the previous question; but first let me understand what the gentleman from Missouri wants.

Mr. RANDALL. You no longer hold the floor, as you have demanded the previous question.

Mr. GLOVER. I have nothing to say; the gentleman demanded the previous question and the House is dividing.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us vote down the previous question.

Mr. GLOVER. Then I will submit my resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 106.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the House will take no action which would seem to reflect on the Doorkeeper of the House without giving him a chance to be heard; and, as I understand the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri, it proposes to do that very thing.

Mr. GLOVER. I did not hear what the gentleman from Kentucky said.

Mr. WHITE. I said I had no objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri other than this, that it seemed to throw the present Doorkeeper out without giving him a chance to explain these charges made against him.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, have I the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has the floor.

Mr. GLOVER. I accept the modification of my resolution suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and will make that a portion of the resolution; and ask the action of the House upon it as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts send up to the desk the amendment he suggested?

Mr. HOAR. I have not committed it to writing. The idea I had in making the suggestion was this: I supposed that all desire to do justice to this man, and I thought the resolution should recite that, the writing of the letter which has been read to the House being admitted, it seems to the House that the person who wrote it is an improper person to be retained in his present office.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the House will take no rash action in regard to the Doorkeeper without giving him an opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. WADDELL. Does the gentleman from Mississippi know that Mr. Fitzhugh wrote that letter?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not know the fact personally, but I am going on the supposition that he did write it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GLOVER. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair directs the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri to be read as now modified by himself.

The Clerk read as follows:

In view of the foregoing letter written by L. H. Fitzhugh, which has just been read to this House, without any reference to other charges made against him, of the truth of which the House is not informed,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that L. H. Fitzhugh is not a proper person to hold the honorable and responsible position of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the United States, and that the said Fitzhugh, as Doorkeeper, be, and he is hereby, dismissed forthwith from that office.

Mr. RICE. I hope this hasty action will not be taken.

Mr. GLOVER. If the House does not act upon this question at once, the whole day may be occupied in its discussion. I think the House understands the merits of the case.

I have not any doubt in my own mind, independent of anything contained in these newspaper articles, that the gentleman himself acting as our Doorkeeper is unfit to occupy that position. I apprehend that all that has been said about this House and throughout the country in the last few weeks ought to satisfy every gentleman on this floor that this is not a case to be investigated. I for one do not want our committees to be spending their time during the balance of this session in investigating the character of men who impose themselves upon this House and delegations from States in this House in such a way as this, not making any explanation of their former history.

I call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. In regard to the matter to be printed, I ask unanimous consent of the House that so much of the letter which has been read as relates to ladies be stricken out.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. GLOVER. I accept that suggestion.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that where the names of ladies or of any members of this House occur blanks be substituted.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that all allusion to ladies in the letter as published in the newspapers be stricken out? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GLOVER. I yield a few moments to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, there is always a degree of respect to be paid to officers of this House or to any other officer of the Government who has been chosen to fill an important position. Here and now is a charge preferred against our Doorkeeper in the presence of the country, by a gentleman who I suppose holds himself responsible for what he has done, criminal in its nature, and destructive of good character, involving no less an offense than arson, coupled with a lesser charge of having written an indiscreet and foolish letter; which all acknowledge to be the case, and regret was ever written. The best of men sometimes do such things. In confidence with their friends they write a good deal which they would not have published to the world, and occasionally they are betrayed by these supposed friends, and confidential communications come to light just as has occurred in this case.

For that act, however, and in extenuation of it I have nothing to say, except that he was unfortunate in the selection of his friend and confidant. He must stand or fall by his own act, so far as public taste or public judgment is concerned. But as stated above, in addition to the charge of bad taste, another charge has been preferred, which goes upon the record and which will stand there for all time to come. And now, sir, to adopt this resolution and require him to resign without giving him an opportunity to explain these charges which have been so placed upon the record will be doing, in my opinion, gross injustice to him as a man and officer. Even if he were the most obscure and humble individual in the land, should he not have the opportunity to explain these matters and have accorded to him the same privileges others have had when you have proposed to investigate their conduct? Why adopt a different rule for the Doorkeeper of the House from that which has been established for all other officials with whom the House has had to deal? Why should this summary process be dealt out toward him, when others have had the opportunity to go before investigating committees and explain as far as possible their alleged misdeeds? I can see no good reason for taking a different course with this officer. He should have an opportunity to explain his conduct, and if he can say anything in extenuation of the letter he has written or the other grave charge, let it go to the country for his own benefit and that of his children after him; but let not this body of the representatives of the people, under the excitement now swaying it, condemn the man without giving him a hearing or listening to his side of the case.

There may be extenuating circumstances of which we know nothing. Why, sir, we do not thus condemn unheard the simplest cases that go before our criminal courts. Every man has a right to be heard by himself, or by counsel, or by both. The Constitution guarantees that right to him, however guilty or insignificant; and if we pass this resolution to expel him, he goes out under the ban of this House; and the impression will prevail that we believe him guilty of all the charges made against him, and you cannot prevent the public mind from coming to that conclusion. Why, sir, this case is not more serious than a dozen others that are being investigated. It is said that this man has been guilty of writing an indiscreet letter and that he embraced in it many things that he had no right to mention; and for this cause alone he should be expelled. But connected with it is a criminal charge which involves character, and, if true, would subject him, had this charge not already been inquired into, to criminal prosecution and ignominious punishment. And though this House may declare by its resolution that he is only expelled on account of the letter, yet the public mind would fasten itself upon the criminal charge made, and forever his expulsion would be set down to this cause. The whole thing ought to be investigated, and the country have the benefit of his explanation. I am opposed to the resolution, which goes upon the presumption of guilt, in the absence of all proof, and would condemn and punish him without the privileges extended to the common felon. Let the investigation be had, and, if found guilty, then let the penalty follow. The resolution ought to be referred to a committee.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. HARRISON. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that this House has no right to investigate charges that have been made against any member or officer of the House in years gone by. This man comes before us charged with crimes; but, sir, the very charges state that he was acquitted. What have we to investigate here as to these things? He was charged with arson, and the court found him not guilty. He was charged with false swearing, and the court said he was not guilty. He was charged with crimes, and upon every charge there was an acquittal, and both are on record here. It is not a question for us to go into and investigate. If every man who comes into this House, either as a member or officer, has to be brought up on every charge brought against him by malevolent men to be investigated, we shall be investigating to the end of the year. But there is another question, and that question simply is, shall we keep Mr. Fitzhugh here? He has written a letter that is pronounced foolish. We probably have no right to dismiss him, and, sir, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, that he be requested to resign.

Mr. MORRISON. That is what Belknap did. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Illinois that an amendment offered at this time would not be in order, except by the consent of the gentleman holding the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I stand here to say that there are committees investigating all sorts of charges.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, as an act of simple justice to Colonel Fitzhugh, I submit to the House the following papers and documents bearing upon the matters under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

[The indictments in Kentucky, and result of the trials.]

[Letter from Hon. William L. Jackson, of Louisville, Kentucky, at present judge of the circuit court in the Louisville district.]

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, April 8, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: I am informed that certain enemies of yours with a view to your injury (that could be but temporary, for the facts are your triumphant vindication) have forwarded copies of indictments that at one time were pending against you and your son. You were triumphantly acquitted on these charges; so also your son. It was the universal belief of all good people that these prosecutions had their origin in the malice of Jones and others who had been sued in the United States court by Tom Scott for damages, they having, as it was alleged, kukluxed him by hanging him, &c. You incurred their malice because you stood up for Tom Scott, who was a colored man, and because you were an important witness in his behalf. Tom Scott in the suit recovered a verdict of several thousand dollars against the defendants. I was present at the Willard Hotel when the parties implicated by Tom Scott, on the day before the trial of the case, attempted to browbeat and bully you, evidently intending to get you in a quarrel and kill you, and I saw your calm and undaunted courage make them quail and cower. I have always believed that if I had not been present they would have forced you to the difficulty, but I must say that you exhibited a high order of self-possession and courage.

In view of your vindication, both by the verdict in the Tom Scott case and your honorable acquittal, this malice, if it is attempted, will I am sure recoil upon the conspirators and "will plague the inventors."

You are at liberty to make such use of this as may be necessary and proper.

Very truly yours,

WM. L. JACKSON.

Hon. L. H. FITZHUGH.

[Editorial from the Louisville Commercial of February 11, 1871.]

A NEW PHASE OF KUKLUXISM.[1]

The Ku-Klux operations in this State have heretofore almost entirely been confined to outrages on defenseless negroes and white republicans, or Union men. This routine was slightly varied from in the late transaction at Crab Orchard Springs. The burning on the night of the 4th instant of the hotel in that place, owned by Myers, Fitzhugh, and Jones, was the occasion of an outrage which has few parallels for malignity and villainy. The negro boy Robert Scott, who was arrested, and implicated the two sons of Colonel Fitzhugh in the burning of the hotel, convinced almost every one of the truth of the story he told about a lie being extorted from him by white men previous to his examination before 'Squires Carson and Roberts.

The hotel was burned on Saturday night, while Colonel Fitzhugh was absent from the town. He has had several difficulties with his partner, Mr. Jones, and had withdrawn from the business. The boy Scott was an employé of the house. The night following the fire, a band of armed, disguised men went to the house where Scott was stopping, and took him to a tree, where he was threatened with death if he did not confess that he burned the house. A pistol at his head and an oath that his brains would be blown out if he did not confess convinced the boy of the necessity of acceding to the demand made upon him. He admitted that he did burn the house. They then renewed their rope and pistol arguments, and made him implicate Colonel Fitzhugh's two sons, James and John, as the instigators of the deed. Having thus forced him to confess a lie, they took him to a spring-house, where they left him, with the threat that if he stirred from the spot before an officer came to arrest him they would shoot him dead. Returning to their rendezvous, they unmasked themselves, and a portion of them went to the spring-house, where the boy was found half frozen. He was arrested by Constable Higgins, who told the boy, on taking him to his room, to confess everything. The boy then told the constable what these disguised men had done to him to extort a confession of a lie from him.

When he was brought to trial he was not even permitted to make his statement. The boy Scott had been at a party on the night of the fire without absenting himself from the room during the entire evening. The witnesses to this fact were threatened by a negro hired by the Ku-Klux with death if they dared to appear at the trial. They were intimidated by threats of death by hanging. Notwithstanding all this outrageous and villainous proceeding, the boy Scott was held in $150, which was a virtual acquittal, and the sons of Colonel Fitzhugh were honorably discharged.

A rumor was also circulated that Colonel Fitzhugh had gone to Louisville previous to the fire to increase his insurance, when the truth is he came here for the purpose of canceling his insurance, and did have over $9,000 of his policy so canceled.

The Legislature is now in session. Many of the members are personally known to Colonel Fitzhugh and his family. Here is an instance under their legislative nose where an honorable gentleman and his family have been conspired against by a band of Ku-Klux, who have endeavored to force a negro boy on threats of death to implicate himself and two respectable young gentlemen in a crime of which none of them had any knowledge.

This is a stab at even more than the lives of our citizens; it is a fiendish attempt to disgrace innocent men through the forced confessions of a negro. It was done with a purpose so devilish and malignant that Colonel Fitzhugh and his friends should prosecute the villains to the bitter end.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal of February 12, 1871.]

The Crab Orchard fire.

A gentleman who came down from Crab Orchard yesterday informs us that the prosecution of the young Fitzhughs, on the charge of having burned the Springs Hotel, utterly broke down, and they were discharged yesterday, not a particle of evidence having been adduced against them. Much interest was manifested in the case by the citizens, and the result was received with evident satisfaction by the public. It seems that they were at a party in the neighborhood when the fire broke out, and the negro man, Tom Scott, whose arrest on the charge of having set fire to the house at their instigation we mentioned some days ago, was at another party, given by a negro, and went with others of the company to help extinguish the flames. Eighteen or twenty of the negroes present at the party testify that Tom Scott was presiding over a confectionery table all the evening, and was not out of their company a single minute for hours previous to the alarm. Yet he was taken out on Monday evening by a band of masked men, and forced, under pain of death, and to save his own life, to confess that he had burned the house and had been employed to do so by the Fitzhughs. As he utterly repudiated this confession as soon as he was assured of protection by the citizens, and as his second story was corroborated by so many of his own race, the citizens were naturally indignant at the use of such means to blast the character of respectable people. In view of his own confession, however, Scott was held in $150 to answer any indictment that may be found against him.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal of May 6, 1876.]

The Cincinnati Gazette, referring to the Doorkeeper of the national House of Representatives, says: "Fitzhugh is a great man. He even declares that he is 'a bigger man than old Grant.' Meantime the Courier-Journal is endeavoring to show that the indictments for arson, perjury, grand larceny, and other crimes found against this great man were not true. As the Doorkeeper thoughtfully remarks, 'thus wags the world.'" The Courier-Journal has merely said of Colonel Fitzhugh what it believes from considerable knowledge of his character—that he is incapable of the charges laid at his door. We published yesterday a letter from W. G. Welch, esq., of Stanford, giving the case against Fitzhugh, and no one could read it without feeling that the points were strained. Our impression at the time was that things had got into a muddle; that one ill-feeling had led to another, the whole resulting in an ugly feud. That is our impression now. Colonel Fitzhugh has always appeared to us to be an exceptionally brave and generous man, overflowing and excitable, but in no sense malignant or vicious.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal of April 29, 1876.]

Colonel L. H. Fitzhugh—The reckless Inter-Ocean takes up a gauzy yarn about the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives—The real facts of the case as told by Mr. T. W. Bullitt, counsel for Fitzhugh in the matter in question—Manufactured political capital.

One of the Courier-Journal's local force called on Mr. Thomas W. Bullitt yesterday in relation to an article telegraphed from Washington to the Chicago Inter-Ocean, in which were made very damaging statements concerning Colonel L. H. Fitzhugh, Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, and his sons, James and John, both of whom are in the employ of the Government. The Inter Ocean asserted, with its accustomed recklessness, that, in addition to having served in the "rebel army," Colonel Fitzhugh had since varied his occupation in even a more disreputable way than in his first great sin. It charged him and his sons with larceny, arson, and false swearing, and published copies of indictments for each of these alleged offenses, said to have been committed in Kentucky, at Crab Orchard Springs. The article in the Inter-Ocean was so ingeniously arranged that no mention of the fact that Colonel Fitzhugh and his sons were honorably acquitted is made. How so great an oversight could creep into the statements of the Inter-Ocean, we have but one solution—it wished to make political capital out of a yarn which they well knew to be without even the semblance of truth.

Yesterday a Courier-Journal reporter showed to Colonel Bullitt a copy of the Inter-Ocean article, and stated to him that he wished to obtain any information concerning the Fitzhugh case that he might be able to communicate, whereupon the gentleman said:

"I have read the article purporting to be from the Chicago Inter-Ocean, as published in the Louisville Commercial of this morning, and having been of counsel for Colonel L. H. Fitzhugh and his sons in the trial of the indictments published, I acquired in that way quite an accurate knowledge of the facts connected with the charges contained in the indictments.

"The first material circumstance which strikes me in reference to the publication is, that the record is not published in full, the fact that Fitzhugh and his sons were acquitted of each charge being omitted. I am unable to perceive how any one taking a copy of this record could accidentally overlook this fact. The trial of these indictments was had several years ago, but I believe that my memory is accurate in respect to the evidence adduced, as well as to the rulings of the court and the findings of the jury. Upon the indictment charging larceny, the court peremptorily instructed the jury to bring in a verdict of acquittal, upon the ground that there was no evidence tending to sustain the indictment. On the indictment for arson the case was allowed to go to the jury, which, after an absence of but a few minutes, brought in a verdict of acquittal. I do not now remember whether the indictment for false swearing was dismissed on motion of the Commonwealth or whether it was brought to a trial. If the latter, it also resulted in an acquittal."

"In regard to the evidence adduced in the support of the indictments?" asked the reporter.

"At this distance of time," resumed Mr. Bullitt, "I would not attempt to give the details of the evidence, but believe that I can state accurately its substance. In each of the cases the principal prosecuting witness was one D. W. Jones, who had been a partner with Colonel Fitzhugh as one of the proprietors of the Crab Orchard Springs. It appears from the testimony that the families of Jones and Fitzhugh had divided between themselves certain of the bed-clothing and table-furniture belonging to the hotel, for the separate use of their respective families. That used by Fitzhugh was kept in a trunk in his private room. When the fire occurred which destroyed the Springs hotel this trunk was removed, with other of Fitzhugh's property, to another room in one of the buildings not burned. The trunk was found and opened by Jones, and upon this state of facts the charge of larceny was preferred.

"In respect to the indictment for arson, the evidence was in substance as follows: Colonel Fitzhugh was not in Crab Orchard, but in Shelbyville—a distance of more than one hundred miles by the ordinary mode of travel—on the night of the burning, and had been there for several days. His sons were not at the hotel, but absent at a dancing-party. Directly after the fire a negro, Thomas Scott by name, was taken out by certain of the citizens of Crab Orchard and vicinity, and threatened with death unless he should make a clean breast and confess all his knowledge of the burning. Under the apprehension of these threats, he made what was said by some of the parties to be a confession implicating Colonel Fitzhugh as having employed him to do the burning. I have never seen the negro; he was not introduced as a witness by the Commonwealth, but I am informed that as soon as discharged from the custody of the mob and placed under the protection of the law he steadily and continuously denied all knowledge of the burning, and especially repudiated the idea that Colonel Fitzhugh or his family had instigated it. I believe I may say with certainty that there was no evidence tending to connect Colonel Fitzhugh with the burning of the Crab Orchard Springs other than this forced confession of this negro Thomas Scott. Colonel Fitzhugh lost by the fire a considerable amount of valuable personal property, and there was no evidence conducing to show any possible benefit he could have derived from the burning.

"As to the indictment for false swearing, as I have said before, I fail to remember whether it was tried or not. It was founded upon a statement by Colonel Fitzhugh that he expected to prove by an absent witness that the trunk, containing the clothing previously mentioned, had no lock, or perhaps that the lock was out of order. The charge of swearing falsely upon this point was as entirely without foundation as either of the others."

"What was Jones's motive in the procuring of the indictments?"

"I am not prepared to express an opinion as to the motives of Mr. Jones or of any other person connected with the prosecution of these indictments. I have given you what I believe to be a full and correct statement of the substance of the evidence and the result of the trials. I do not feel disposed to go further. I may, without impropriety, say that the trial developed the fact that there was a strong hostility between Jones and Fitzhugh—reaching back, however, into circumstances of which I have no personal cognizance, and am therefore unwilling to speak."

With a view to procuring further information, if possible, the reporter visited the United States district court-room. He examined the court records, and discovered that the negro Tom Scott, referred to by Colonel Bullitt, had several years ago brought suit against D. M. Jones and others for an outrage alleged to have been committed upon him by them. A verdict of guilty was found in the cases against Jones, Welch, and Gilkerson, each of whom was fined $1,000; Shannon was fined $700, and Messrs. Higgins and Alexander a cent each. The case against Dunlap was dismissed. Jones and the others mentioned are the men who are supposed to have forced the confession from the negro. Jones was an avowed enemy of Fitzhugh, and also very active in procuring his indictment on the testimony of Scott.

[Letter from L. Peyton, concerning the charges made by Marshal Purnell.]

WASHINGTON CITY, December 4, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: Having learned that the unsupported statements of Marshal Purnell of Texas are injuriously affecting the interest of Colonel Fitzhugh, I deem it due to him to say that they are false in every particular. Colonel Fitzhugh, nor any other man in Texas, ever approached me in connection with the investigation of the accounts of Marshal Purnell, nor as to the character of the report that I was authorized to make in the case of that corrupt marshal.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

L. PEYTON.

Hon. Messrs. REAGAN, CULBERSON, and others.

[Letter from Ex-Governor Edmund J. Davis, of Texas.]

AUSTIN, TEXAS, May 4, 1876.

DEAR COLONEL: Yours of 28th April has been received. I note what you say about that rascal Purnell and his gang trying to injure you by slanderous charges. It is a good joke, indeed, when Purnell attempts that sort of thing: the devil reproving sin.

If my indorsement may serve you with democrats or republicans you are authorized to say from me that your character has, since your residence in Texas and my knowledge of you, which now covers several years, been entirely beyond reproach. You stand infinitely above that fellow Purnell and all of his sort in every respect. I trust that no gentleman in either House will be influenced in his treatment of you by any of the slanderous insinuations you allude to. While you are a decided democrat in politics it is but just to say that you are a fair one, and a gentleman.

Mr Britton will send you some papers.

Very truly, yours,

EDMD. J. DAVIS.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. After the statements which have been made here by gentlemen on the other side of the House that this officer was unwilling to resign his position with these charges of a criminal nature hanging over him and desired an investigation of whatever matters the House might require to be investigated, I doubt somewhat if it would be fair play or justice for the House, after such a request as has been presented by this officer through his friends, to summarily adopt this resolution and expel him without a hearing or without the trial and examination he has requested and expel him from his office and his connection with this House.

I am not one who believes that the moment a charge is made against a public man it is necessary for the whole of the House of Representatives to rise in arms and give force and impetus to the slander, if it be a slander, or to refuse a fair examination if it is asked. I am one of those who have stood here in this whirl and confusion of slanderous reports against political friends of my own, and I have tried to stand cool and calm and await the results of examinations. I have demanded it for my friends as I demand it for my foes, for if there be anything in the character of the American people and if there should be anything in the character of the Representatives of the American people it should be that old inherited quality of love of fair play and justice to any man, friend or foe, political or otherwise.

Now this resolution follows in the wake of long, voluminous criminal charges which are placed upon our record. It follows in the wake of criminal indictment placed upon our record. It follows in the wake of a letter giving secret history, as it alleges, of the subject-matter of these indictments. Who believes that any man can go forth to the world with this accumulation of charges, public and private, and ever regain any respect or confidence among his fellow-men if it is followed by a summary resolution of this House to expel him from his office, even although there be placed in the resolution of dismissal a denial by the House that it is not for the grave charges referred to in all the previous statements?

I have had occasion heretofore to breast this current of what I believed to be slander and calumny against my political friends, inaugurated and pressed forward by gentlemen on the other side of this House; and as long as I believe my political friends to be innocent I expect to stand there and breast the slanderous and calumnious current with such coolness and calmness as I may. I should be unjust to myself, untrue to my own consciousness of what is right if I refused, when the character of a man is assailed, to allow him the same opportunity for investigation that I demand for my own political friends. In that sentiment I believe I represent fully the honest, true sentiment of the American people, that would allow fair play and just dealing to every man when charged with offenses which if true would render him infamous and disgraced in the eyes of his fellow-men.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] for three minutes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I rise to support the resolution as it stands. I am not opposed to investigation, and would prefer it if there were anything to investigate. But in this case it would be manifestly improper and altogether impracticable for us to go back and investigate the decisions of courts in past years. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] has stated, the courts have passed upon these charges, and have rendered a verdict of not guilty; and there the matter should rest. That verdict cannot be re-investigated and overruled by this House.

Then, as to the letter written by the Doorkeeper, that is not to be investigated, because it is admitted to be true; there is no denial of the contents of the letter as read. It is manifestly indecorous, indecent, and improper, and such as, I think, renders the person who wrote it unfit to hold a position as an officer of this House. This is not, as I view it, a summary proceeding, but a proceeding with all the facts before us. It is a matter upon which we are as competent to pass now as we would be after a week's investigation. Therefore, I say, in no spirit of unfairness and with no desire to do this person any injustice, it is due to the House and to the country that we should say now that this person is unfit to continue to hold the position of Doorkeeper of this House.

Mr. LAMAR. Will my friend from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] yield to me for one minute?

Mr. GLOVER. I will yield to my colleague [Mr. PHILIPS] for three minutes.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I have but one word to say, and that is this: The only question now before this House is as to what action should be taken upon the pending resolution in its present form. With regard to the criminal charges against the Doorkeeper of this House, they are omitted in this resolution. The House is now asked, I am asked, to give a vote for a resolution peremptorily expelling the Doorkeeper of the House from his office upon a letter purporting to have been written by him. I never heard the letter read until it was read a few minutes ago. This House is asked to pronounce judgment of expulsion against this officer upon that letter without one particle of evidence before us to the effect that this Doorkeeper ever wrote it. There is no admission here from the accused that he is the author of that letter. Will the House of Representatives of the United States proceed to pronounce its solemn judgment of expulsion upon a high officer of the House upon a charge wholly unsupported by evidence? Did he write that letter? Who says he wrote it? Does he admit it? If so, when and where? Has he made the admission in such form that we can take judicial cognizance of the fact and attach to it the character of evidence? Have there been any interpolations made in the letter? Is it genuine in all its parts?

I am unwilling, as a matter of justice and common right to the humblest and meanest individual that lives and breathes, to pronounce a judgment upon him without a hearing. Let him be heard. That right is guaranteed by the Constitution and by every principle of justice and of common honesty. Let him give his explanation, and if that explanation be not satisfactory it will be time enough then to pronounce judgment upon him. I trust the action of the House will be so shaped as to refer this matter to a committee, with instructions to report upon it to the House in the shortest possible time. When that is done, we can act advisedly and wisely, as becomes the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. GLOVER. I am sorry I cannot yield to other gentlemen. There have been some fifteen or twenty applications made to me, and I suppose before those shall have been exhausted there will be a hundred more.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] for one minute.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I beg pardon of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. GLOVER,] but will remind him that he promised to yield three minutes to me.

Mr. GLOVER. I did, but I understood the gentleman afterward to withdraw his request.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I did, but would ask the gentleman to yield three minutes to me, so that I can give the time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. GLOVER. If the gentleman considers that I am under obligations to yield to him——

Mr. MILLIKEN. I do not say that, but I make the request.

Mr. GLOVER. I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I desire only a moment, not so much to urge any views to influence the vote of others as to disclose the motive which will control my own on this question. I cannot vote for this resolution as it now stands. I believe this subject should be referred to a committee. I have listened to the suggestion so forcibly put by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD,] and others, that the action of this House now proposed is not directed against its Doorkeeper as a result of the charges made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE.]

The answer which the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes is to my mind conclusive. Sir, it is true that those charges present the fact that this Doorkeeper was accused and tried and acquitted of certain crimes, and that he does stand before this body unconvicted of any legal guilt. But, sir, the imputation in those charges is clear, explicit, and unequivocal that the evidence adduced at those trials and other facts show this individual, although acquitted upon technical grounds of the crimes charged, to be guilty of moral turpitude. The accusation made, sir, is distinct that there were facts showing him to be an infamous character, although he was not convicted by a jury. That is the exact point made by resolution and statements submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky. The charge involved in them is not that the Doorkeeper is a convicted criminal, but that he is an infamous person, notwithstanding his acquittal.

Now, can this House properly pass by without notice this charge thus formally preferred, and proceed immediately to the expulsion of this officer for what it deems an act of folly; for having written a letter in the abandon of private confidence, showing no guilt of any sort, showing nothing of moral baseness or venality, but simply showing ridiculousness and nonsense?

A MEMBER. It shows indecency and falsehood.

Mr. LAMAR. Where is there anything indecent in it? Where is the falsehood that is spoken of? Where is the imputation upon anybody in the letter for which the writer should be expelled without investigation? To expel this officer upon that letter in the teeth of these charges of criminalty would look like acting upon a pretext, like a backing out from the charges of ignominious conduct against this officer and getting rid of him upon some other ground. For this reason, if it be in order, I move the reference of the resolution to a committee for investigation.

Mr. GLOVER. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the time may come when it will be proper to expel this officer; but I do not think that this is the time. I believe every one is entitled to a hearing; and this officer ought to have a hearing. Cain, although known to be guilty, was allowed a hearing. No interest can suffer by giving this man a full hearing; and I trust that it will be allowed. While we may strike, still we should hear. This course best accords with the dignity of the House. I do not know but that this man is guilty of offenses which when established should prompt the House to dismiss him; but let us at least give him a fair hearing. In that way we shall do ourselves more credit, and perhaps do him less injustice.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to do any injustice, or to act in conflict with the views of members in relation to this subject. My own judgment is that the House should take immediate action and expel this officer.

I wish to say one word in relation to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. PHILIPS,] who assumes, in advance of an investigation, that the letter spoken of is not genuine. I would like to ask him, or any other member, whether any one questions the genuineness of that letter?

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I beg to state, with the permission of the gentleman, that I made no intimation that the letter was not genuine. I said that I was asked to vote upon a letter of the genuineness of which I had no evidence. That was all I said.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] or anybody else seen the original?

Mr. GLOVER. I have seen the original. I have seen several letters from this officer. I think I am about as well acquainted with his handwriting as I am with my own. There can be no question about the genuineness of the letter.

I now move, as it seems to be more in accordance with the sense of the House, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, who I hope will make it their special duty to report at the earliest possible day, so that the scandal that has been spread over the country in relation to this officer shall be cleared up and he removed from his position. I move the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman allow me two minutes?

Mr. GLOVER. I have had fifty applications from gentlemen who wish to speak on this question, and I repeat that I cannot yield to gentlemen out of order in this way. I ask the previous question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] will by unanimous consent be allowed the time he asks.

Mr. BANKS. This is certainly a very important question, and we are taking a very important step. I hope the gentlemen will allow me two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri refuses to yield.

Mr. GLOVER. I move the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may be heard.

Mr. GLOVER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will renew the call for the previous question I have no objection to yielding to him, if it be in order.

Mr. BANKS. Very well; I will do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending motion, as the Chair understands, is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the House owes something to itself in this matter as well as to the officer who is implicated. It certainly would be a very dangerous step for us, upon a charge made as suddenly as this has been, to expel either an officer or a member. In all such cases it is necessary and right that there should be consideration. But I do not think that any charge appertaining to the personal character of the officer in question ought to be considered in this connection. There is enough in the letter which has been published to show that this officer is utterly unfit for the position which he holds. It is not material that this is a private letter, It may just as well be a private letter as a public letter so far as it is an indication of the spirit of the officer as regards the honor of members of this House and other officers of the Government.

Now, sir, I think we should have some positive notice of this letter, and give him, the officer who is charged with having written it, some opportunity for explanation, and a hearing which has not been given to him as yet. Therefore I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri by providing that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Rules, or any other committee which may be designated.

Mr. GLOVER. That is the motion which I have made.

Mr. BANKS. Very well; let it be referred to the Committee on Rules, and in the mean time, until that committee shall report, and they should be instructed to report immediately, the officer in question should be suspended from his duties.

Many MEMBERS. O, no!

Mr. RANDALL. Suppose he is found to be an innocent man, what wrong you would then do him by such suspension.

Mr. BANKS. It can do no harm. If before the committee he shows he is innocent of this offense in any way, then the House can do him abundant justice. There has been opportunity enough for him to have made some suggestion to the House in the way of explanation since this letter was published. If the House shall suspend him from the performance of his duties until this committee shall report and he is found to be an innocent man, then it can vindicate its reputation and honor and do all that is necessary to make the officer in question good for any damage done to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to refer this matter to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BANKS. I move an amendment that pending the report of the committee the Doorkeeper of the House shall be suspended from his duties.

Mr. GLOVER. I do not yield for that purpose and I do not accept the amendment. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules, or the whole subject?

Mr. GLOVER. My motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought the motion covered the whole subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the resolution will take the whole subject before the committee.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on referring the resolution and this whole subject to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill until he came under the heading of "office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General" to the following paragraph:

For pay of agents and assistants to distribute stamped envelopes and newspaper-wrappers, and expenses of agency $10,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out the last word of that paragraph for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this item. The amount expended for this purpose last year was $16,300. It strikes me he has overlooked that fact, and that about an equal sum should be appropriated for the next year.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee thought that $10,000 was sufficient for that purpose. It is $4,000 more than the other agencies.

Mr. FOSTER. But $16,300 was expended last year.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me there is no good reason why there should be any discrimination between this and other agencies. The committee was of opinion this appropriation of $10,000 was amply sufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. I call the gentleman's attention to line 82, where it is provided for pay of agent and assistants to distribute postal cards, and expenses of agency, $6,100. Last year $16,000 was expended.

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimate is only for $6,100, and the appropriation is fully up to the estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimate, I think, is $16,300.

Mr. HOLMAN. Six thousand one hundred dollars as I have it here.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, if the gentleman is satisfied he is right, I will not insist on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The expense of the agency for postage-stamps was $6,900; the expense of the agency for postal cards was $6,100; and in view of the character of the labor performed at each of these agencies, the committee was of opinion that the expense of the agency for envelopes and newspaper-wrappers should not exceed the other agencies more than $4,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For engraving, printing, and binding drafts and warrants, $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that no appropriation is made for miscellaneous items in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. Is that intentional?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, that was stricken out as to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office. The estimate was $2,500. What does the gentleman from Ohio propose?

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to make it $2,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. These branch offices—Bureaus as it were—I do not think should have special miscellaneous appropriations made for them.

Mr. FOSTER. It is pretty hard to cover every item by appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true, but we have appropriated for the general purpose of miscellaneous and incidental items for the Post-Office Department $145,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very much less than formerly.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is true. It is somewhat less, but still it is a large sum. Inasmuch as that is an appropriation generally for the Post-Office Department, I think it is hardly necessary to make another appropriation for miscellaneous items here. That was the opinion of the subcommittee, that it was not necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For transportation of foreign mails, $220,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like the gentleman from Indiana to give some explanation in regard to the amount appropriated for this purpose, the transportation of foreign mails.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is about the amount expended last year. The committee were of opinion in the first instance that this appropriation was not necessary in consequence of the postal treaties between this Government and certain European governments, together with governments elsewhere throughout the civilized world. But we learn from the Post-Office Department that this appropriation is still required, but not to this extent. The amount expended last year was somewhere about the amount we propose to appropriate here, $220,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman from Indiana see that the Post-Office Department would be greatly embarrassed if a greater sum should be needed, as the probability is that there will be?

Mr. HOLMAN. As I have said, we appropriate about the amount that was expended last year, and my impression is, although I am not quite certain, that $220,000 was deemed by the Department sufficient for this year.

Mr. FOSTER. This is an expense that must be incurred. There is no escape from it. The Government must pay it. And it strikes me the appropriation should be raised.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to be a very large appropriation, and I think it is entirely sufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman thinks so, of course it must be so.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount appropriated heretofore has been $300,000, I admit, but that sum has never been expended. I do not see any propriety in appropriating a larger sum than is necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. The point is this: that this is an expense which must be incurred, and it is a payment to foreign countries; and we cannot afford to take any risk upon it. The gentleman does not charge that any abuse has grown out of this appropriation. It is simply a payment to foreign countries for foreign postages. If the sum to be paid is greater than the amount appropriated, the Department must necessarily be embarrassed.

Mr. HOLMAN. As we appropriate about the amount which has been expended, I think it is a safe thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the following section:

SEC. 2. That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $2,680,905, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amount in this section will have to be somewhat increased, and it is difficult at this moment to tell what will be the exact amount. And inasmuch as the amount here will be affected by some of the subsequent provisions, I ask that by unanimous consent this section may be passed over for the present.

There was no objection; and the section was temporarily passed over.

The Clerk read the following section:

SEC. 5. That the respective compensations of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, assigned in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster-General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof, for four quarters immediately preceding the adjustment or re-adjustment, by adding to an amount of the box rents of the office received or estimated not exceeding $1,200 when the boxes are supplied and owned by the postmaster, and two-thirds of the box rents and not to exceed $1,000 when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster, commissions on all other postal revenues of the office to an amount not exceeding $1,300, at the following rates, namely: On the first $100 per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $400 per quarter, 50 per cent.; and 30 per cent. on all revenues exceeding $400 per quarter, but the aggregate of the said commissions not to exceed $1,300; and at all offices where the total revenues exceed, respectively, $4,000 per annum, there shall be added to the compensation hereinbefore provided from box rents and commissions a percentage of the gross revenues at the following rates, namely: 1 per cent. on all sums over $4,000 and not exceeding $10,000; 9-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000; 8-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $20,000 and not exceeding $40,000; 6-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $40,000 and not exceeding $80,000; 5-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $80,000 and not exceeding $160,000; 4-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $160,000 and not exceeding $320,000; 3-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $320,000 and not exceeding $640,000; 2-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $640,000 and not exceeding $1,280,000; and 1-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums exceeding $1,280,000; and in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case: Provided, That at offices, where the letter-carrier system is now, or may hereafter be, established, the box rents, in fixing the compensation of the respective postmasters at such offices, shall be estimated at not less than $1,000 per annum; but at all such offices they shall be estimated at an amount which, with the commissions and percentage hereby allowed, will make the salaries of the postmasters thereat not less than $2,500: And provided further, That the maximum salary and compensation of any postmaster under the provisions of this act shall not exceed the sum of $4,000, except in the city of New York, where the salary and compensation shall be the sum of $6,000 and no more.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move an amendment, leaving the salary of the New York postmaster at its present rate, $8,000.

Before saying anything in support of that amendment, I wish to say a word in answer to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. FRANKLIN,] who made a statement yesterday in regard to the total receipts from local postage in Brooklyn and the expenditures for free delivery which I was not prepared at the moment to answer. I wish now once for all, in the fewest possible words, to explain to the House why it is that the receipts from postage and the expenditures in Brooklyn compare so unfavorably with those of Boston and New York. The truth is that Brooklyn does its business in New York, as I will proceed to show.

The population of Boston is about 350,000 in round numbers. The receipts for postage in Boston are $951,000. The population of Brooklyn is 500,000 in round numbers. The receipts for postage are $168,000. Now it must be perfectly apparent that there is some natural reason for the receipts in Brooklyn being comparatively small. The people of Brooklyn write as many letters as the people of Boston, and yet with a population of 500,000 the total receipts at the Brooklyn post-office, according to the postmaster's report, were $168,000, against $951,000 in Boston, with a population of 350,000. The explanation of this is simple. I have a neighbor, Mr. Claflin, who conducts the largest individual commercial establishment in the world, and who has lived in Brooklyn for more than thirty years my neighbor. I do not suppose that he ever mailed or received three letters a week in Brooklyn, while his commercial establishment during many years of its existence has deposited in the New York post-office at least a thousand letters a day and received as many more. My own correspondents while I am here as a member of this House almost all of them receive and date their letters in New York. This, once for all, explains the reason why Brooklyn is entitled to the free-delivery system, without reference to the comparatively prejudicial contrasts of small receipts.

Brooklyn contributes her full proportion to the $1,800,000 of surplus which New York receives over and above the expenditure. The exact surplus in New York last year was $1,792,000—I stated it yesterday at $1,800,000—of which the people in Brooklyn, who are mostly business men doing business in the city of New York, contribute their full proportion.

Now, a word as to my amendment. From that side of the House, last year, Mr. Potter, of New York—a gentleman not now a member of the House—proposed last year that the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York should be $10,000. It was compromised upon $8,000. Now I will not detain the House by any argument in regard to the absolute necessity of leaving it at $8,000.

I undertake to say here there is not a man to be found in New York in any business whatever of the capacity of the present postmaster there whose services could be secured for any such sum as $6,000 per annum. I know him personally; I know his devotion to his duty; I have seen him sit at his desk attending to matters of detail to protect the Government from loss, and indicating a degree of intelligence, fidelity, and business capacity for which $6,000 is no compensation. It will be most discreditable to the judgment and discretion of the House, with the responsible duties imposed on the postmaster of New York, his salary shall be reduced as here proposed.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish at the proper time to offer an amendment, so that the paragraph shall read "except in the city of New York and the city of Philadelphia, where the salary and compensation shall be the sum of $6,000 per annum each for the postmasters in those cities."

Mr. Chairman, I recollect very well in the last Congress when the salary of the postmaster of New York was raised to $8,000 by a Senate amendment. At that time I made a great effort to satisfy the Committee on Appropriations, of which I had the honor of being a member, that the salary of the postmaster at Philadelphia should be increased from $4,000 to $6,000 per annum, and I did it principally upon this ground, that the time of the postmaster at Philadelphia was as fully occupied in the performance of his duties as was the time of the postmaster at New York. I am aware that the receipts from the post-office at New York are much larger than the receipts at Philadelphia, the former being in round numbers $2,900,000, while the receipts at the Philadelphia office are about $1,000,000. Both of these offices pay largely in excess of their expenses; that in the city of Philadelphia realizing a clear revenue above expenses of nearly half a million and the New York post-office a clear net revenue of much more than $1,000,000. But, Mr. Chairman, these two postmasters, who have great responsibilities and perform to a great extent the same duties, should receive compensation more equal in amount. I can see that while the gentleman from the Brooklyn district [Mr. CHITTENDEN] complains of the reduction of the salaries of the postmaster at New York from $8,000 to $6,000, yet to equalize the salaries of the two officers in New York and Philadelphia would produce no increase in the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, but would leave the aggregate salaries of these two officials, as now, $12,000. In other words, the proposition in this paragraph of the bill reduces the New York postmaster from $8,000 to $6,000, and my proposition adds $2,000 to the $4,000, the present salary of the postmaster of Philadelphia.

In the office in Philadelphia just now the business is immense, and for the next six months or a year it will so increase, owing to the centennial exposition, that the work to be done is absolutely beyond present computation; it will be doubled and trebled. There is now a post-office in the city and one also on the centennial grounds, and the postmaster himself must see to the performance of the duties of the offices in both places. This will be the case to the close of the present year and will extend far into the coming fiscal year; but I do not see why at any time there should be a difference in the compensation of a postmaster in a city containing over 800,000 population and that of a postmaster of a city containing 1,000,000 inhabitants, the amount of business in each being so large. I do not want to depreciate, nor could I, the importance of the business done in the post-office of the city of New York, but at the same time I want to impress upon the members of the committee the fact that the duties of the postmaster at Philadelphia are as onerous as those of the postmaster at New York; that every hour of the day is given to his duties, while his salary is only one-half that of the latter postmaster. I urgently ask the committee to vote for increasing the salary of the postmaster at Philadelphia. I think it proper, just, and equitable that the postmasters of each of these two cities should receive a salary of at least $6,000 per annum. I believe in giving proper salaries for efficient performance of duty. Those two offices are well organized, that in New York employing five or six hundred persons and that in Philadelphia three or four hundred; and it requires a man of ability, a man of great energy, knowledge, and information, and of great executive power to conduct such offices, and we should be willing to pay appropriate salaries for the performance of such duties.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I withdraw my amendment to allow a substitute to be offered.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will renew it.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move to strike out the proviso, as follows:

And provided further, That the maximum salary and compensation of any postmaster under the provisions of this act shall not exceed the sum of $4,000, except in the city of New York, where the salary and compensation shall be the sum of $6,000, and no more.

I agree in most of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] have said. I think it is perfectly just and proper that the postmasters of those offices that have an immense amount of business, such as the two in New York and Philadelphia, should receive a larger salary than the postmasters of offices which do a much smaller amount of business. I believe that the scale adopted by this bill should run as well to the large offices as to the small ones. I will state here to the committee that this part of the appropriation bill was submitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and considered by them, and they have instructed me to ask that the scale adopted in the bill as first furnished by the Postmaster-General shall be adopted by the House. We have investigated the matter thoroughly, and I desire to submit to the House some figures in regard to the salaries of the postmasters in the larger cities. Under this bill, the following would be the salaries of the postmasters in the leading cities of the Union and of all the cities that go above the maximum now in the bill of $4,000:

City.	Gross amount.	Salary.
Saint Louis	$446,603	$4,279
San Francisco	423,136	4,199
Cincinnati	399,950	4,129
Boston	951,284	5,472
Philadelphia	966,813	5,503
Chicago	903,409	5,376
New York	2,978,678	7,828
Baltimore	335,171	3,900

It will be seen that by this table the postmasters of Saint Louis, San Francisco, Cincinnati, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, and New York are the only postmasters whose salaries may run above the maximum fixed by the Committee on Appropriations, and it will make an aggregate difference of only about $7,800. In view of that fact, I believe that the scale adopted in this bill should run from the lowest to the highest offices in the country, so that we can always know precisely what will be the salary of the postmaster according to the amount of business done in his office; and it should apply to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Chicago as well as to the smaller cities.

The object of the Postmaster-General in adopting this scale of salaries was to remedy the great inequality that exists in the salaries of the different postmasters of the country. Under the law that we seek to repeal by this bill there were nearly one hundred post-offices in the country whose postmasters received the maximum salary of $4,000, some of which offices yielded an annual gross revenue of not more than $26,000. There was the office at Fort Wayne, Indiana, for instance, where the postmaster received a salary of $4,000 a year, while in the cities of Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston, the gross revenues of which amounted to nearly a million dollars each, the postmasters received only the same salary. In view of these facts, and also in view of the fact that this scale would increase the appropriation for this purpose only about $7,000, I think it would be just and proper for this House to strike out the proviso fixing the maximum salaries in any part of the United States.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman again state the salaries under the proposed scale of the New York and Philadelphia postmasters?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will do so. Under this scale the postmaster at Philadelphia would receive $5,500, the postmaster at Boston $5,500, and the postmaster at New York $7,890 a year.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman also be kind enough to state the gross amount of business of the different post-offices?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. In round numbers, the revenues of the Boston post-office were $951,000; of Philadelphia, $966,000; of Chicago, $903,000; of Cincinnati, $399,000, nearly $400,000; and of Saint Louis, $446,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will not prevail. I do not think that now is the time to raise salaries. I will instance a case for which this House has been severely censured in reference to what has been termed loose legislation. I notice in the Washington Republican of this morning an allegation against this House, that we have been reckless in the passage of private bills, that we have been indifferent to the amount of money involved in them, and that on last Friday week this House passed as many as sixty-eight private bills.

I have taken some pains to make an examination into the truth of that allegation, and I find that of the sixty-eight private bills passed on last Friday week two were Senate bills; forty-two were bills granting pensions for services in the Army of the United States; six came from the Committee on War Claims and were for money long delayed, to be paid for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States; seven were from the Committee of Claims, of which two provided for referring claims to the Court of Claims; and three bills provided for refunding taxes illegally and improperly collected, amounting in the aggregate to $29,000.

Now the fact is that the whole of our work on last Friday week involved the taking from the Treasury of but $122,000. A single objection would have prevented the passage of any one of those bills. Of all the money involved in those bills, $50,000 was for supplies furnished the Union Army, either taken by the commanding officers or furnished under contracts, one a mule contract and another a wood contract.

In view of the criticism made upon our action of last Friday week, I hope we shall be careful to give no reason for fault-finding by raising salaries at this time. I call attention to the following review of our action in passing private bills on Friday of last week, showing that not a penny was taken from the Treasury in property.

Number of bill granting relief.	Amount.	By whom reported.	From what committee.	Remarks.
2829	$7,200 00	Mr. Pratt	Claims.
2832	21,090 00	Conger	War Claims.
2833	2,640 00	Eden	War Claims.
2835	7,253 90	Milliken	War Claims.
2836	15,300 00	Milliken	War Claims.
2849	600 00	Bradley	Claims	To credit postmaster in settlement of his accounts.
1503	160 00	W. M. Robbins.	Claims.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the House should be thankful to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] for making that statement. There was a large attendance in the House on Friday of last week, and the bills were examined as carefully——

Mr. RANDALL. Of the sixty-eight bills forty-two were for pensions. If we had refused to pass them what complaints there would have been.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the statement of the gentleman is very clear and conclusive. But I do not exactly indorse his views in reference to increasing the expenditures of the Government in respect to salaries. The statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will withdraw my amendment, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] will renew it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will renew the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK,] and will not offer mine if his is to be adopted. In reference to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] in regard to economizing expenditures, I think every one desires to economize in a proper way. But I do not think his remarks are very appropriate after the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. CLARK, of Missouri] that the scale of salaries proposed by him for the postmasters in the larger cities does not increase the amount proposed by this bill much over $7,000. Certainly that is not extravagant.

Mr. Chairman, there is one thing to which I desire to call the attention of this committee. I judge the committee have examined the full statements sent here by the Post-Office Department and by the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the details of this bill and the working results of certain post-offices. Hence it is only necessary for me to remind members that in nearly all the cities designated in this scale the post-offices are matters of profit to the Government. By the system of local letter-carrying, local deliveries, and local rates, the profits of these offices are very large, in spite of the very great expenses incurred. From them the Post-Office Department derives the means to sustain various other post-offices in the country. Thousands of them must however continue to be an expense rather than a profit. The rapid increase of population, the ceaseless tide of the people toward the unsettled portions of the country, demands the establishment of post-offices, and as we add millions to our population the expenses of the Post-Office Department must grow yearly larger than the receipts.

I do not think the salary of the postmaster of the city of New York as graded in this amendment is too high for the duties performed. I think the salaries of the postmasters at Boston and Philadelphia should each be at least $6,000, but I will vote for this amendment which would give them $5,500 each, hoping that in more auspicious times their compensation may be more fairly adjusted.

As has been stated many a time during the consideration of this bill, and in years past, it is impossible that we can ever make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. It cannot be done; the people are not looking to us to do it. They want postal accommodations, and will have them from one end of the land to the other even at the risk of deficiency bills. I want to say another word in behalf of the postmasters in the larger cities, and I know whereof I speak. There are no such responsible positions under this Government as those filled by them. As I said a while ago, these positions require men of enlarged minds and great executive ability; and those who fill them should have commensurate salaries.

When the receipts of a post-office reach about $1,000,000 a year there can be very little difference in the work done by the postmasters whose office yields above that sum, as far as the question of compensation is concerned, and really there should be very little difference in that respect between New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. In the last Congress I co-operated with great pleasure in increasing the salary of the postmaster of New York, and I had hoped then that the salary of the postmaster of Philadelphia would be increased from $4,000 to $6,000. Now, the Post-Office Committee, which must know more of the details and working of the Post-Office Department than the Committee on Appropriations, have, after a great deal of consideration, presented a scale of salaries, which I think, under all the circumstances, should be adopted. I fear we can do no better. I submit that we may safely indorse their action in this matter, and vote for the amendment proposed to this paragraph by the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of that committee, in behalf of that committee, as I understand.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I regard the question now before the House as a very important one; and while I have from the beginning supported the Committee on Appropriations upon every point where I could do so conscientiously, I have been conscious all the time that there were defects in their plan which experience must and would develop immediately after it should be put in operation. They have failed to discriminate in respect to departments of the Government over which we have passed, as I ask them now to discriminate in respect to this matter.

There can be no question about the propriety of maintaining the salary of the postmaster in New York; and I am willing to concede the propriety of the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri with reference to the other officers interested. There can be no question that in order to retain first-class men these salaries should be upon a larger basis than that proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. I accept the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, although the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks that it will increase the salary of the postmaster at New York above $8,000. Whether it does or not, I say with frankness that I accept the proposition as coming near to justice. I presume that it will be accepted by the postmaster himself as the best he could reasonably hope for. I have never passed a word with him upon this subject; but I know the character of the man; I know the responsibility attending the collection of $3,000,000 in post-office details; I know the responsibility that rests upon him for distributing the numerous mails which concentrate every day in New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the postmaster in Philadelphia is constantly employed; but the responsibility is threefold greater in New York than in Philadelphia, both in regard to the mails distributed and the money collected. I trust that the Committee on Appropriations will make no objection to this amendment. It is but a picayune, so to speak; it is a pittance of $7,000, to be distributed between five or six officers who have the management of these vast institutions which really control the mails of the whole country. I am sure that a word cannot reasonably be said against the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the first proposition that has come into this House to increase salaries; yet we have been in session some four or five months. I feel quite confident that my friend from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK,] who has generally favored every measure of retrenchment that has been presented here, who is entitled to a great deal of credit for the measures of reform attempted in this bill, will not, upon a little reflection, press this motion.

The salaries now paid by this Government are, in the general judgment of the country, far above the salaries paid by the States for official services, and far beyond the salaries paid in private employment requiring corresponding ability and integrity.

The salary of every office that will be affected by striking out this clause is now and will still be under this bill $4,000 a year. I refer to the cities of Philadelphia, Boston, Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, and Baltimore. These salaries of $4,000 approach the salaries paid to officers having charge of the great Bureaus of our Government. The salary of the postmaster at New York has been made exceptional. It was last winter for the first time fixed by law at $8,000. It had never before been higher than $6,000. Upon the appropriation bill of last session this salary, upon the impulse of the moment, was increased from $6,000 to $8,000. All these other salaries have been for years $4,000—never above that sum.

Now, I wish to appeal to my friend from Missouri that in this instance, where the salaries are very ample, he will not insist upon such an increase. The effect of his amendment is substantially this: The salary of the postmaster at Baltimore will be increased nearly $200.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is a mistake.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nearly $200. The salary of the postmaster at Boston will be something near $6,000; the salary of the postmaster at Chicago will be increased nearly $2,000; the salary of the postmaster at Cincinnati will be somewhat increased; and the salary of the postmaster at New York will be raised largely more than $2,000—to a sum greater than it ever before has been in our history.

I am not willing, sir, to pay salaries to postmasters of these cities more than we pay to the Treasurer of the United States, or a thousand dollars more than we pay to the heads of the great subtreasury interests of the country at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, and Chicago, where the salaries are fixed at only $4,500.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. Does he not think there is a difference in the position? A man's ambition might lead him to take the treasurership of the United States at a smaller salary than he would be willing to take the position of postmaster of New York. He must take that into consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know why a citizen performing his duties well and faithfully cannot earn as much reputation as postmaster at New York as Treasurer of the United States. But what comparison is there as to responsibility? The gentleman talks about responsibility alone. The fact that the postmaster at the city of New York receives in the progress of twelve months $3,000,000 of revenue and the postmaster at Philadelphia nearly a million is brought forward as a reason why we should vote large salaries. Why, sir, the Treasurer of the United States has hundreds of millions of dollars passing under the control of his subordinates in the progress of a year, and yet you esteem a salary of about $6,000 amply sufficient for him. You invest the great judicial interests of the Federal courts with salaries of not over $6,000, and down as low as $3,500. In the great States of the Union, in the courts of final resort, it is esteemed that salaries of four or five thousand dollars are ample and sufficient to secure the best talent those States can afford.

But a word more, Mr. Chairman. There is no question of responsibility involved here. The practice inaugurated by Congress nine years ago is that it is not a question of the amount of money which comes into the hands of the high official of the Government, for as you put money under his control and responsibility on his office you increase the number of employés, you increase his clerical force, and you actually diminish the labor to be performed. The postmaster at New York or Philadelphia does not perform as much actual labor as the postmaster of some towns where the salary does not run above $2,000. The reason as I have suggested for this is as the responsibilities run up in importance the clerical force is enormously increased. The postmaster is a mere supervisor and the responsibility is not increased, for under the policy which I have referred to, inaugurated nine years ago, you relieve the postmaster whenever he shows you a loss has been sustained not the result of his own want of integrity or because of negligence of duty, so that the responsibility amounts to nothing. All you ask of the postmaster now is an honest performance of his duty—nothing more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired, and debate upon the pending proposition is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I should like to say a few words on this question before debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending proposition is under the control of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman will withdraw his proposition I will renew it.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I wish to correct an error made by the gentleman from Indiana, and then I will yield the floor. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I renew it, and yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to correct the figures of the gentleman from Indiana in regard to these large post-offices. I have gone over them carefully, and I do not think I am mistaken. In making the calculations I discover the gentleman from Indiana has given the same figures that were given by Mr. Marshall, who sent the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had that bill before me. I said "about." I said these figures were a little higher than in the bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Much higher.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not much.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The bill as presented to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads reduced the bill as sent by the Postmaster-General or by Mr. Marshall. The salaries I gave to the cities of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, Boston, and Cincinnati, I am satisfied are correct. The salary of the postmaster at New York was $7,800, at Chicago $5,400, at Philadelphia $5,500, and $5,500 in Boston.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend is seriously mistaken as to New York. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, who furnished the original bill upon which this as well as the one prepared by the gentleman from Missouri are founded, puts the salary of the postmaster at New York at $8,500. I do not think the reduction in this bill on that salary exceeds $300.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not object to the gentleman from Indiana taking up my time if he will yield me the five minutes to which he will be entitled to when my time has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois now. I wished merely to show the ground of discrepancy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will now be considered as having five minutes in his own right.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to say a word as to the amendment. The provisions respecting postmasters' salaries are substantially those contained in the bill reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The Committee on Appropriations saw proper to stick it on their bill with two changes only, I believe. One is making the maximum salaries $4,000, except in the city of New York, and the other is as to a matter about which I shall ask the attention of the committee presently when I move an amendment in regard to box rents.

Now, sir, by the bill the commissions to postmasters are limited to $1,300 per annum, whether there be ten thousand dollars revenue or a million dollars revenue at respective post-offices, and two-thirds of the box rents where the boxes are owned by the Government not to exceed $1,000. That makes $2,300. Then the committee agreed upon a small percentage decreasing as the revenues increased in addition. Under the operation of this bill of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which, as I have said, was substantially adopted by the Committee on Appropriations, the salaries are greatly cut down as to offices now getting from $2,000 to $4,000—at least 20 per cent., and in some instances more—aggregating, as is claimed, some $600,000 or $700,000, in fact, I think, about $400,000. Under the bill as proposed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and the operation of a uniform system of percentages, the salary of the postmaster at New York would be reduced a little from the present salary, and the salary of the postmasters at Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago would be from $5,500 to $5,800; but the Committee on Appropriations fix the maximum salary at $4,000, except New York, which is fixed at $6,000. This interferes with the operation of a just and equitable rule, for the Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia offices, with a round million of revenue each and many millions of dollars responsibility, annually get but a very slight addition of pay over offices where the revenue is only $100,000.

Ah, but, said the gentleman from Indiana, and it was very well put, salaries ought not to be increased. And he said again in reference to this matter there is not much risk in being postmaster now at these large offices, because the policy of the Government is, where somebody makes a default, for instance a deputy or clerk, that Congress should relieve the postmaster by special act, and these postmasters in large cities have a much easier time than the postmasters in small cities. If the gentleman's argument is worth anything, it proves too much; because by his bill he fixes New York at $6,000. But the bigger the office the less the work, and if Congress can relieve, why put New York at $2,000 more than the other cities? According to the gentleman's logic it should be less.

Mr. HOLMAN. We were yielding to a common prejudice.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The best way is to do what is right and to look the facts squarely in the face that the revenues of the New York post-office amount to millions, and that the revenues of the Chicago, Philadelphia, and Boston offices are nearly a million of dollars in round numbers; and that these offices being the depots for the money-order business and having great risk and responsibility, should have somewhat larger salaries than where the revenues are $50,000 or $100,000.

Hence I say that it is fair and equitable that this percentage should be allowed as to all these offices, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, and New York. It only costs (I again call attention to this fact) between $7,000 and $8,000, all told, more under the bill of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads than it does under the bill of the gentleman from Indiana, saving, I will say, however, again, under both of the bills, as the gentleman claims, $600,000 or $700,000, and, as I say, between $400,000 and $500,000, upon the present salaries of postmasters throughout the country. I hope the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will be sustained in the amendment which its chairman offers by the unanimous instruction of that committee; and I want to protest here against the establishment of the policy that, where there is a default in a post-office by a deputy or clerk, Congress will relieve the postmaster by special act from loss. Such a practice will encourage carelessness and fraud, and if followed will cost in the end millions of dollars, besides demoralizing the service. The true way is to pay not large salaries, but to pay what the services are fairly worth, taking into account the responsibility and work done, and then if loss occurs let the postmaster be held strictly accountable for the same.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I withdraw the amendment, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] may renew it.

Mr. MILLER. I renew the amendment.

I desire to say but a word or two. There seemed to be a discrepancy in the statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in regard to the salaries at these large offices affected by this amendment. I am satisfied that the statement as made by the gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, is correct; and I can very easily see how the gentleman from Indiana fell into the error he did. It will be observed that there was a difference in these statements on each salary of about $500. Now, by the bill that we have before us box rents are fixed at $1,000; that is the maximum amount. But in the bill as prepared by the Post-Office Department and from which the gentleman from Indiana made his statement, box rents were fixed at a maximum of $1,500; making in each case, as far as these large offices were concerned, a difference of just $500 in the estimated salary. The gentleman from Missouri is therefore correct, and the salary of the postmaster of New York City, if this amendment is adopted, will be but $7,800; a reduction of $200 from his present salary.

I desire to say one word more. If the amendment is adopted, we have a uniform symmetrical system for estimating these salaries from the lowest to the highest, and giving no postmaster more than the responsibilities of the office entitle him to. It raises no postmaster's salary where the receipts of the office are under $400,000. Now, there is one fact to which attention has not been called that increases the responsibility of the postmaster. The amounts of bonds required from postmasters are in proportion to the receipts of the office. Now at an office where the receipts are above $400,000 the postmaster will be required to give more than $100,000 in bonds. I do not know what is the amount of the bond required at the New York office, but it is possibly $1,000,000. Is not that something that ought to be considered and should it not have its due weight in fixing the salaries? If you adopt the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, you have a uniform symmetrical system from beginning to end, that in no case puts the salary too high, and besides, when it is all complete, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have reduced the salaries in the aggregate to the amount of half a million of dollars. Is not that enough even to satisfy the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOLMAN. I must answer that question in the negative; it does not begin to satisfy me. In my judgment the salaries are all still higher than they ought to be—all of them except the low salaries; and in framing this bill and the basis of the bill prepared by the Post-Office Department and revised by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, we have sought to provide well for the smaller salaries, to guard against reducing those salaries which are under $1,500 a year, and we have endeavored to reduce salaries only where the compensation was large in proportion to the duties actually performed. Neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLER] nor any other gentleman can meet this argument against the proposed increase of salaries, and that is that you do not increase the responsibility or the amount of labor in proportion to the amount of revenue derived from an office. The gentleman from New York must bear in mind that the postmaster of New York performs no more work intellectually or officially than a postmaster whose salary does not exceed $2,000. What kind of government is that where the mere dignity of station is taken into account in the question of an increase of compensation? What kind of republicanism is that? Integrity and the duties performed are the elements that should enter into the question of compensation of officers of this Government and not the mere circumstance of high position; but if you adopt the principle of increasing the compensation of men who occupy high offices, why do you give the postmaster at New York more salary than the Treasurer of the United States? The gentleman from New York says that by striking out the limitation on salaries, the old limitation which has existed for years past, we will have a symmetrical system, the salaries running clear up. Does not my friend remember that the same restriction has always existed through our generation and the last? Here is a naked proposition to increase salaries beyond what they were during the expensive period of the war, and that at a time when we are coming down to the hard pan, and at that time the gentleman comes forward with a proposition to increase salaries already ample of offices which are struggled for with absolute vehemence when any vacancy occurs in any of them.

Mr. MILLER. The reason of the limitation heretofore has been that the system was substantially an arbitrary one; there was a difference in percentages allowed to first and second class offices, and we had to have a limitation or the salaries in some cases might have gone up no one knows where. Now we have a system that is fair and just to all parties, and this proposition will add only $7,000 to the expenditure.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend must remember that the salaries run by regular grades up to the session before last, when a break was created between the officers of the fourth class and the officers of the highest classes. There has always been a limitation, and what strikes me with astonishment is that when we are diminishing salaries in all the Departments of the Government a proposition is made to increase some of the higher salaries paid by the Government; and what astonished me more is that that proposition comes from the democratic side of the House, and it is now proposed to increase these salaries at a time when every voice from the people demands retrenchment.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Indiana has spoken of a proposition to increase the salary of the postmaster at New York. Does the gentleman forget that he comes here and proposes to reduce it 25 per cent.? The present salary is $8,000 a year, and he proposes to reduce it mercilessly to $6,000. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] makes it $7,600, and that is a reduction of 5 per cent. Now, I protest against this question being urged here on the supposition that I have asked an increase of the salary of the postmaster at New York. I am simply protesting against the absurd and indiscriminate carelessness which the committee have shown in reducing this salary to $6,000. The gentleman from Indiana himself, if he will go to New York for one day and visit the office, will not come back and propose that the salary of the postmaster of New York shall be reduced to $6,000. He cannot conscientiously do it, and I know he is a man of conscience. I will say to him that, if he will go there and examine the business of that office and come back here and propose to reduce the salary to $6,000, I will confess to an enormous blunder.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been there already. I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from New York is not acting with his usual ingeniousness on this subject. He did not tell the House that last winter, for the first time in the appropriation bill, under a spasm of the moment, this salary was raised when the office had been filled at a lower salary by gentlemen of admiral qualifications.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did so state, and I stated that the proposition to increase that salary came from the other side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I never heard that the office went begging. A short time ago a vacancy occurred in the Boston office, the salary of which gentlemen desire to increase, and some of the very best business ability in the city desired the position. Mr. Tobie, the present postmaster, is one of the best business men in that city; he is a scholarly gentlemen of wide information with whom I have had the pleasure of coming in contact with on investigating committees.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman not suppose that there are in his district many persons who would be willing to serve the country as members of Congress for $1,000 a year?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman strikes the key-note of all this matter. The truth is that the unanswerable argument against this increase of salaries, against all high salaries, is that the only effect of them is to introduce cupidity and venality into public employment. The sense of honor dies out, and the money consideration alone remains. Through the first three-quarters of a century of this Republic the key-note of all salaries was that men should not struggle for public position for the sake merely of the compensation, but from that higher motive, that true American motive, of honorable employment in honorable positions. How all that is faded away, in the last few years, as you created the motive in public employment of money and gain instead of the higher motive of honor.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him——

Mr. HOLMAN. The struggle for position has become humiliating to the American people, growing out of the high salaries we pay.

Mr. HALE. Assuming that this day of decadence of public virtue has set in, as the gentleman seems to intimate, does he really believe that the increase of salaries for offices under the General Government, setting aside other advantages which I may call illicit advantages, has led to that decadence? Does he believe that the salaries, generally speaking, of officers to-day under the General Government bear any higher relation to actual expenditures than they did in the days of simplicity and honor to which he refers? I would like the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say this, that in spite of the oft-repeated statement of the greater value of money in past years, the compensation in various forms paid to the officials of this Government as a general thing has been increased.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman give us an illustration?

Mr. HOLMAN. While I do not conceive that there is a general decadence of public virtue—for there is a great mass of people of this country who have no political aspirations beyond that of seeing their Government well and honestly administered, a great mass composing indeed the great body of the people of this country—still my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] cannot deny the fact that the extraordinary struggle for position of recent years has been largely induced by motives which in past years were not deemed proper motives in a struggle for public position.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not simply the amount of money formerly paid for salaries, but the countless other forms of compensation that tend toward the demoralization of the public officers of the Government. I would have those salaries enough to be a fair compensation for the services rendered and to secure integrity and efficiency in every Department of the Government; but I would go no further than that. I would measure salaries by the compensation received by citizens in the private employments of life possessing corresponding qualifications. Whenever you go beyond that, you bring into the public service the motive of venality, the struggle for position, and then venality in the exercise of the powers of the office. My friend must see that as long as the salaries of officers of this Government are beyond the salaries paid by the States to their officers, and beyond the compensation paid in private employments, this venal motive will exist to a great extent. It is proposed here to pay postmasters, who with a business education of a few years are competent to enter upon the discharge of their duties, salaries vastly beyond those which you pay to the highest judicial officers of most of the States of this Union, indeed in excess of the salaries paid to governors of States. However, I do not regard that as a fair comparison; but a comparison between these employments and the highest judicial offices of the States I consider a fair comparison.

In States like my own, and that is only an average State, $2,500 is deemed a good salary for every judicial officer below that of judge of the supreme court; and $4,000 is considered ample to secure the best talent of the State for the supreme judgeships. In many other States there is paid a still lower grade of salaries to such officers.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HALE. I renew it for the purpose of saying that I do not believe in the wholesale attack waged by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] upon salaries in this crusade that is being urged for retrenchment and economy. To me that is one of the least of the evils that rest upon the American people. As yet I have failed to hear from any source, private or public, by letter or conversation or by reading in the newspapers, of any great complaint on the part of the people in regard to the compensation which we pay the officials under the Government of the United States. That is not the evil. It is not true that generally speaking the salaries of the officers of the Government have been increased out of proportion since the first days of the Government.

Why, sir, when the Constitution was adopted, when our frame-work of Government was set up and the wheels put in motion, the pay which was then fixed for all officials in public life here in Washington or elsewhere set those officials by virtue of the salary which they received higher above the ordinary income of the people than they are to-day. No man who will go back and make the comparison can by any fair process come to any other conclusion. The Cabinet officers, the heads of Bureaus, the clerks in the Departments, the postmasters throughout the country, the collectors of customs, the marshals, the judges, were all of them in that day, if we can gather anything from the literature of the time, the correspondence of those days, the history of that epoch, further above the common compensation of unofficial life than they are to-day. There was then no such competition in business, no such extent of business as gave men the immense incomes which are realized to-day. I say to my friend from Indiana (and investigation will confirm the statement) that the office-holder of sixty, seventy, and eighty years ago stood above the people by virtue of his salary infinitely—I use the word advisedly—infinitely further than he does to-day.

We have not gone on demoralizing the public service by increasing salaries unduly; and the gentleman from Indiana, when he wastes his strength upon this subject-matter, is wasting strength that he could better bestow elsewhere. These are not the evils that the American people are complaining of to-day. We are feeling at this time the effects of a tremendous war just closed and the convulsions that have come down to us from that war. A certain looseness of public spirit, a certain desire for public gain, has, as I do not deny, unfortunately crept into public life; but it is not the allurement of increased salary that draws men improperly into public life; it is not the incitement of too much pay to be received legitimately from the Treasury that has drawn improper men into the public service. It is not this that has given rise to the scandals of the day. The gentleman from Indiana ought to see this and know it, and should spend his strength in other matters where it is more deserved.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Maine tell me what is the salary of the governor of Maine?

Mr. HALE. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. Now does not the gentleman think that the governor of a State like Maine should have quite as much salary as the postmaster in any city other than New York?

Mr. HALE. I am not making the application specially; but I am glad that my friend has referred to the salary of the governor of Maine. It was formerly $1,800; and $1,800, the sum fixed by the fathers of the State when the constitution was framed in 1820, was as to the purposes to which the money could be applied and the things it would purchase, double the $2,500 which was fixed by the Legislature of Maine ten years ago, when I was a member of that body. The salary to-day is small, too small.

Mr. RANDALL. The salary of the governor of the State of Massachusetts is $5,000; that of the governor of Michigan, as I am informed, is only $1,000.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make one statement, which I think may not be uninteresting, in illustration of the point made by my friend from Maine. It will aid in giving the means to compare the salaries paid to public officers at the beginning of this century with the earnings of the people in other walks of life which were well paid.

The city of Boston at the beginning of this century was the second city in the Union. It was surpassed by none in wealth and general scale of living. It had a very large India trade, very large commerce, and very large business with the interior. One of the famous India merchants of that day is said to have had twenty ships in Holmes's Hole at one time.

Christopher Gore was one of the most eminent lawyers of that day. He was minister to England under John Adams. He thought of resigning his office, and he wrote home to Fisher Ames, then the most eloquent and able advocate of Massachusetts and one of the greatest orators that ever lived, asking him what he could hope to earn at the bar if he should resign his office as minister to England and come home. The letter which Mr. Ames wrote in reply is preserved. He tells Mr. Gore that he will have no competitor at the New England bar except himself and Samuel Dexter, then one of our ablest lawyers, who, as gentlemen will remember, was afterward Jefferson's Secretary of the Treasury. They three, he said, would share the principal law business of that commercial city; and he assured Mr. Gore that he might well hope in a very short time to earn an income of $1,500 a year! Mr. Gore resigned his office and came home. He earned such income—I do not know what—as might be expected; he lived in affluence, and left a beautiful country-seat, which is still to be seen, in the neighborhood of Boston.

Thomas H. Perkins, the most famous and wealthy merchant of Boston, went to New York about the same time and consulted Alexander Hamilton, a year or two before his death, about a case involving the entire value of an India ship and its costly cargo. Mr. Hamilton examined the question with great care, for the question of law was a difficult one; and for that opinion he charged the enormous sum of $20! Chief Justice Parsons, than whom there was never a greater intellect on this continent, before he went upon our supreme bench argued in the neighborhood where I was born the case of the will of General Rutter, involving the entire property in what in those times was a very large estate. He came from Boston twenty miles, and delivered a most extraordinary argument, the tradition of which still lingers in that neighborhood; and for that argument he received $20!

Certainly, if you compare the compensation of the best paid profession in those days with the official salaries received at that time, and then compare the salaries of this day with the incomes of the great lawyers of our commercial cities—New York, Boston, Philadelphia—I do not think there will be found any ground for the belief that there has been a degradation of our public virtue by raising unduly the salaries of our officials.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw the amendment I will renew it.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew it.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in charge of the bill, has laid down what I regard as a proper standard of compensation for public service; that public officers filling responsible positions should be paid in proportion to the service of men of equal talent, character, and standing in private life. I accept that statement fully. The trouble which I see in the gentleman's argument is this, that he undertakes to export the rates of compensation which prevail in his own State to other localities where different rates of compensation exist. I am very familiar with the salaries paid for service in private life in the city of New York, and I can say the salary which the postmaster of that city receives, $8,000 per annum, is a low salary compared with what a man of similar ability, fidelity, character, and general capacity to deal with the peculiar duties which he has in hand would receive in private life. As a rule the salaries of presidents of banks are $10,000. The salaries of most cashiers of banks in New York are $10,000. Some, however, receive $8,000, and in smaller banks some receive as low as $5,000; but in any bank entitled to be considered a first-class bank the salary is not less than $10,000 per annum.

Now the analogy which is sought to be established between the compensation paid for business service and the compensation which is paid to men chosen to fill high positions of honor does not apply to the case of the postmaster at New York. It is simply a business position, and I am glad, as the occupant of that office to-day happens to belong to the party to which I do not belong, to be able to bear testimony here to the fact that he has discharged his duty with an acceptance so great that no man, democrat or republican, in the city of New York desires his removal. I say that the institution itself is on a scale of such magnitude it would be a blunder of the grossest character to remove or to do anything which would cause the resignation of a man so eminently fitted to discharge the difficult duty of that position.

The post-office of the city of New York differs from the post-office of any other city in this country. It is the entrepôt of the foreign trade of this country. Foreign commerce centers there and foreign correspondence and foreign mails pass through that office. The management of that institution is extremely difficult; and while I do not wish to say anything in derogation of the officers who have filled that place prior to the present postmaster—and I do not forget that among them was General Dix—I say in my day no man has exhibited the capacity to deal with the difficult duties of that office as the present postmaster of New York has dealt with them. I can say, if such service could be secured in private life for the sum of $8,000 a year, the person who could get them would deem himself extremely fortunate.

Now, the question presented here is whether the postmaster at New York shall be singled out and made an exception to a general principle, or whether a general principle shall be applied which will encourage officers in other cities to become equally valuable and efficient? I come to the conclusion we should not deal by exception. We ought to deal as far as possible by general laws based upon general principles, and hence I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri on my right [Mr. CLARK] is a proper one to be adopted, for I should be glad to see the same results we have by accident achieved in the city of New York achieved elsewhere and in every city throughout the country. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will prevail. In any event I think I am safe in protesting in behalf of the business people and the entire population of the city of New York against any reduction in the salary of the present very valuable and efficient postmaster.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to remind the gentleman from New York that his State Legislature does not accord with his sentiments as to the manner of paying its public officers. The salary of the governor of the great State of New York, like the salary of the governor of the State of Ohio and many other States, is only $4,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will excuse me, it is $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Here I have it at $4,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I cannot help what you have, the salary is $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it has recently been changed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It has been changed and it is $10,000, and the salary of the governor of New Jersey is $5,000, having been changed last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I know the salary of the governor of my own State, that poor tax-and-ring-ridden State, is $10,000, and I did not think it was as high anywhere else.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think I would leave out the "poor tax-and-ring-ridden" epithet.

Mr. RANDALL. I think not.

Mr. O'NEILL. It was in the earlier days, during the ascendency of the loco-foco party, a fearfully tax-ridden State. The republican party has taken off the taxes, and I think the gentleman had better state that fact.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to leave out the statement I made, but it is too true.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman will not assert in this committee that there is a State tax in Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I assert if your State treasury was examined many men would be or ought to be in the penitentiary that are now out of it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I assert that the State treasury has been examined, and that the republican party which has controlled the State of Pennsylvania for fifteen years has reduced the debt put on it by a loco-foco administration from $40,000,000 to $20,000,000. The gentleman cannot deny that.

Mr. HOLMAN. To bring about a restoration of harmony, I suggest that the debate close on this amendment. And I hope the committee will leave no high salary as a fulcrum on which to raise the others.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, there were—ayes 37, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I raise the point that a quorum has not voted. I regard this question as one of great importance.

Mr. RANDALL. You are for economy; are you not? Why raise the point?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FRANKLIN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 47.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I insist upon a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not do that. Let us get on with the bill.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. If the gentleman will allow a vote on this amendment in the House I will not insist upon the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. RANDALL. You will be beat all the worse in the House.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I cannot help that.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to have the salary in the Philadelphia office made $6,000, and I desire to have a vote of the House on that also.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I stated a little while ago, if you once get one salary a little higher than the others that is used as a fulcrum on which to raise the others.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he had better let New York go ahead and drag Philadelphia after it next year.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will set about dragging it up at any time, I will be glad to help him. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow us to have a vote on this amendment in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. If we go on we can finish the bill to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL. That is what we want to accomplish. But this is a very important point in this bill, and gentlemen want to vote upon it in the House; and I think in the accommodating spirit in which the gentleman from Indiana is now he will agree that it shall be voted on. And we can then go on with the bill and finish it.

Mr. RANDALL. The important point in this section is involved just here, in keeping the salary of the postmaster at New York where it is.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the committe rise.

The question being taken on Mr. MACDOUGALL's motion, there were—ayes 17, noes 55.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under duress, rather than let the committee rise and have the public business suspended, we will have to agree that a vote be taken in the House on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, with that understanding the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before we leave this section I desire to offer the following amendment:

In line 11, section 5, strike out these words: "and two-thirds of the box-rents;" so that it will read: "And not to exceed $1,000 when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmasters."

I think, if the gentleman from Indiana will listen to a statement as to the practical operation of this amendment, he will assent to the striking out of those words. Under the law as it now stands—and it is not proposed to change it—where the compensation of the postmaster is $2,000 the Postmaster-General may make an allowance for clerk hire, but not where the compensation is under $2,000; and it is the same in regard to rents, light, and fuel. Now under the operation of this bill greatly cutting down the class of salaries between $1,500 and $4,000, and cutting down the commissions to $1,300 and no more, and box rents to $1,200, where the boxes are owned by the postmasters, and two-thirds where they are owned by the Government not exceeding $1,000, the salaries in many of the offices will be cut down below $2,000, and it will be out of the power of the Postmaster-General to give clerk hire where it may be absolutely necessary.

There is a large class of offices in the country, in towns having from five to ten thousand population, where, from the location of the post-office, by competition the citizens have leased the rooms to the Government rent free, or at a nominal rent, and also fitted up the boxes. For instance, there is in my district one such office at Decatur, there is one also at Champaign, and one I understand at Evanston, and one at Jacksonville. Now Champaign is a city at which is located the Industrial University; it is a city of six or eight thousand people. The revenue in round numbers is $10,000; the commissions under this bill to the postmaster are $1,300. The box-rents in fact are $500; two-thirds of those going to the postmaster under this bill, so the compensation of the postmaster will be largely under $2,000; and the Postmaster-General therefore, under the law, will have no power to make an allowance for clerk hire; yet it will be impossible for one man to perform all the duties of the office. It is the same thing at Decatur and the same at Jacksonville.

Now, then, the Government in fact only owns the boxes at a few large offices; that is, in fact, they only have borne the expense of fitting them up in cities like Indianapolis, Saint Louis, and a few others. So there is no equity in these small cities where the boxes do not in fact cost the Government anything in only giving the postmaster two-thirds of the box rents and in no event over $1,000, and in other cities of same size allowing the postmaster to have all the box rent up to $1,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, at the last session of Congress the post-office appropriation bill contained a clause making it the duty of the Postmaster-General in his annual report to suggest to Congress some mode of reducing the expenses of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me one word; I yield the gentleman the balance of my time on the condition that he will give me one minute to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under that instruction to the Postmaster-General two measures came before the House, one a bill containing substantially the principle of the bill now before the House and the other in relation to the transportation of the mails. General Marshall, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, submits the following report in favor of this provision of this bill. The language of the law is:

When boxes are not supplied or owned by the postmaster, two-thirds of the rent are to be allowed to him.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Marshall, says:

It has seemed to me that a just discrimination might be made, so far as compensation is concerned, between those postmasters who themselves incur the expense and risks of supplying their offices with boxes, &c., and those for whom these sources of income are supplied. My plan, therefore, reserves for the use of the Government one-third of the box rents accruing at an office where the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster.

To secure a general reduction in the amount of compensation, affecting mostly the grade of postmasters whose compensation has been the subject of complaint as out of proportion to the business of their offices, and of the compensation paid to State officials and business men of their localities, I have reduced the maximum limit from $2,000, commissions on revenue, and $2,000, of box rents, to $1,500 each, thus making the limit of compensation from these $3,000, instead of $4,000 as at present; which limit is still further reduced by $500 where the boxes forming the basis of revenue are not owned and supplied by the postmaster.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations, and I presume the same is true of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, adopted the views of the Post-Office Department in the main, and this is simply one of the suggestions of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. I believe this proposition received the unanimous assent of the Committee on Appropriations as emanating from a source on which we could implicitly rely, and it seems reasonable that if the postmaster furnishes the boxes we should give him a proportion of the rent, but that if the Government furnishes the boxes it is right that the Government should derive the benefit from them; but beyond that I simply rely upon this argument of the First Assistant Postmaster-General in behalf of this provision, and I trust that it will not be stricken out. If it be stricken out, it will involve a further modification, or we shall find that the reduction in expenses is very trifling.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I renew the amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would not take the time of the House about this matter if it was not of great importance to some small cities of from three to ten thousand inhabitants in my section of the country, and indeed I believe all over the country. The gentleman is right about the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, but he does not state it all. The original bill drawn up by the First Assistant Postmaster-General fixed the limit to box rents at $1,500, which would give to the postmaster $1,000 when the Government owns the boxes; but the gentleman has cut that down to $1,000, which entirely changes the character of the proposition.

I wish to say that while I have great respect for the Postmaster-General and for the Assistant Postmaster-General I do not consider them by any means infallible, and in offering this amendment I only do what the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads unanimously agreed should be done. We considered the bill prepared by the Post-Office Department with the view to cut down expenses with great care and diligence. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that Jacksonville, Illinois, is in your district, being a city of twelve thousand people and the salary of the postmaster in that city will be cut down by this bill below $2,000 because the box rents added to the commissions of $1,300 would not make $2,000, and the same will be the case at Champaign and at Decatur, cities of from six to twelve thousand inhabitants, and so it is all over the country with a few cities here and there.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not opposing the cutting down of salaries for postmasters, but am opposing the unjust discriminations made by this bill, where offices and boxes have been furnished free or at a nominal rent to the Government the salaries will be cut below $2,000, and in such cases no allowance can be made for clerk hire, and at offices like Decatur, Illinois, from two to three clerks are absolutely necessary to run the office.

Now I say that it is but fair and reasonable that all the box rents up to $1,000 where the Government owns the boxes should go to the postmaster, this bill allowing all the box rents up to $1,500 to go to the postmaster where the Government does not own the boxes. I do not desire to multiply words about this matter if I have made myself understood.

Mr. HOLMAN. We wish to stand by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But you do not stand by the Postmaster-General. You blow hot out of one corner of your mouth and cold out of the other. You quote the Postmaster-General to sustain you when you must know he was writing about another proposition. If you will stand by the Postmaster-General I would not object, but you do not stand by him, because you have cut his estimate down $500 on box rents, when boxes were owned by the Government. As the bill came from the Postmaster-General it provided that two-thirds of the box rents, not to exceed $1,500, should go to the postmaster, and your bill provides two-thirds of the box rents not to exceed $1,000. Now I do not wish any proposition to be carried which would cripple the class of cities to which I have referred, and with all due respect to New York, Boston, and Chicago, I apprehend that that class of cities embracing a population of from five to twelve thousand people ought not to be crippled in their postal service because under the law the Department cannot give them clerk hire, fuel, or anything else unless the salary, made up of commissions and box rents, amounts to $2,000.

The question was taken on Mr. CANNON's amendment; and there were—ayes 37, noes 34.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, do not break up the committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will break it up, sure, upon this matter.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. HARTRIDGE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 39.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. No quorum having voted, the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Do I understand the Chair to announce that because no quorum has voted, the amendment was not agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. When there is no quorum voting, there is no decision of the question.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Chair to say that for that reason the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment was lost for want of a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is better than a call of the House.

Mr. RUSK. We had better quit, as we have no quorum.

Mr. CONGER. I did not distinctly understand the Chair. Does he decide that because there is no quorum voting the amendment is lost?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced that the vote upon the amendment was in the negative. But when the point of order is made that no quorum has voted, there is no decision of the question at all.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] did make the point of order that there was no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] consent that a vote be taken upon his proposition in the House?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No; and for the reason that I am certain, if gentlemen can be made to understand his proposition, he will not get a baker's dozen to vote for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will not be very apt to get his measure through if he goes on in that way.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am making no threats; but I do not think the gentleman himself understands the scope of his own proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is because I do understand it that I am against you

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to inform the committee that he has the floor.

Mr. HENDEE. Then I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee finds itself without a quorum, it is the duty of the Chair to direct the Clerk to call the roll of members, in order to ascertain who are absent.

Mr. FOSTER. Is a motion that the committee now rise in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSTER. Then I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion.

Mr. FOSTER. It is now after four o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Why should the roll be called?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the Chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think I can submit a proposition that will settle this difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FOSTER. What has become of my motion that the committee rise?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will allow us to go back one paragraph——

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FOSTER. What has become of my motion that the committee now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum, it is the duty of the Chair to direct the roll to be called.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the Chair entertained my motion that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL.] The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beebe, Blaine, Blair, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Cowan, Crounse, Danford, Davis, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dibrell, Douglas, Eames, Egbert, Ely, Faulkner, Finley, Forney, Fort, Freeman, Frost, Garfield, Gause, Gibson, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Robert H. Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Hays, Henderson, Henkle, Hereford, Hill, Hoge, Hooker, Hopkins, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyman, Jenks, Frank Jones, Joyce, Kasson, Kelley, Kimball, King, Knott, Lamar, Franklin Landers, Lane, Lapham, Lawrence, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Lynch, L. A. Mackey, Magoon, McFarland, McMahon, Metcalfe, Milliken, Mills, Money, Monroe, Nash, Neal, Norton, O'Brien, Odell, Oliver, Packer, Page, Parsons, Payne, Phelps, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Piper, Platt, Purman, Rainey, Rea, Reagan, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Robinson, Sobieski Ross, Savage, Sayler, Scales, Schumaker, Seelye, Sheakley, Sinnickson, Siemons, Smalls, William E. Smith, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Swann, Tarbox, Thomas, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Van Vorhes, Waddell, Wait, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, G. Wiley Wells, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, Jere N. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Yeates—176.

The CHAIRMAN. The call of the roll having been completed, the committee will now rise, in order that the Chairman may report the list of absentees to the House.

Mr. HENDEE. Should not the list of absentees now be called?

The CHAIRMAN. They will be called in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the Chair will announce the number of members present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will do so as soon as the Clerk has made up the count.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not fully understand the ruling of the Chair in reference to the calling over of the list of absentees. Does not the rule require that as soon as the call of the roll is completed the names of the absentees shall be called?

The CHAIRMAN. They will be reported to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Can the report of absentees be made to the House until the names of those absentees have been called over by the Clerk under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to Rule 106, which provides:

Whenever the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the Chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not making a point of order; I am simply inquiring whether it is not the general rule of the House that after the roll-call is concluded every member has the right to be recorded upon the assurance that he was within the bar of the House before the last name on the roll was called and whether any member can under the present proceedings be deprived of that right?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not apply in this instance.

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill, had made some progress thereon, but finding itself without a quorum the Chairman had caused the roll to be called, and now reported the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll of absentees will now be called. If it should be found that a quorum is present, the House will at once resolve itself again into Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk proceeded to call the list of absentees. During the call the following-named members answered to their names: Mr. BANNING, Mr. BLAND, Mr. BOONE, Mr. CALDWELL of Tennessee, Mr. DE BOLT, Mr. HENKLE, Mr. HOSKINS, Mr. HUNTON, Mr. MILLS, and Mr. SAYLER.

During the reading of the names,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, said: I submit that the list now being read is the report from the Committee of the Whole of the members absent in committee; and gentlemen have no right now to answer to their names.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Subsequently during the reading,

Mr. HENDEE said: I wish to inquire as a question of order whether it is proper at the present stage of proceeding to allow members to be recorded upon the roll as present who were not present in Committee of the Whole when the roll was called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that these members were present.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. DAVIS. A month or six weeks ago I presented papers in support of the claim of Peter Welch, Edward Welch, and Elizabeth Minion, of Mineral County, West Virginia, for compensation for property destroyed during the late war. LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3368) appropriating $9,000 to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Offices in Louisiana, to report it without amendment, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2693) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee, to report it back adversely and recommend its indefinite postponement. I am requested to ask that the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe it is understood that that bill shall go upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a written report, I take it.

Mr. WRIGHT. A written report accompanies the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 476) to amend the fifth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government," approved May 18, 1872, and to extend the time for the presentation of claims for cotton seized after the 30th day of June, 1865, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 784) for the relief of Enoch Totten, administrator of the estate of William A. Lloyd, deceased, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 372) for the relief of J. L. ReQua, S. B. Hubbard, and others, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Consider Parish, of Hinds County, Mississippi, praying compensation for cotton and other property taken during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David Klein, a citizen of New York City, praying to be allowed a royalty for the use by the United States authorities of his patent for ponton bridges, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 477) to re-imburse the loyal owners of the steamer Planter for the sale of that vessel by the Government, have instructed me to report it adversely and recommend its indefinite postponement. At the request of the Senator from West Virginia farthest from me [Mr. CAPERTON] I ask that the bill go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 712) for the relief of William Rutherford, of Washington, District of Columbia, to report it adversely. I may state that this is the same bill, upon the same facts precisely, that the committee acted upon at the last session of Congress. They recommended its indefinite postponement then, and their report was concurred in. The committee now make the same recommendation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask if an order of the Senate to postpone a bill amounts to a rejection of the claim?

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand it so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that the claimants so regard it. The mere postponement of a bill indefinitely is not a rejection of the bill. It seems to me, after this case has been rejected time and again on the same papers, the bill ought to be rejected formally, so as to come under the rule and not be again referred to the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose that would be the effect of its indefinite postponement so far as the present Congress is concerned; and, if we reject the bill formally, it can again nevertheless be presented at the next Congress. An indefinite postponement would have equal effect with a rejection, so far as this Congress is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed the rule extended also to future Congresses, so that the claim could not be repeated over and over again. That seems to be the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose the claim might be presented on new testimony. Under the rule of the Senate the claim could not be considered again at this Congress if the bill be postponed indefinitely, unless there was new testimony; but it could be presented again at a subsequent Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice is, that indefinite postponement closes the claim for the current session; but it may be recalled at a subsequent session and acted upon again.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose that would be equally true if the bill were rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Indefinite postponement operated as a rejection until the Senate reversed the rule in the McGarrahan case.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I suggest to the Senator to move that the bill be rejected. That will dispose of it for this Congress at any rate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that course. I make the recommendation that the bill be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee report that the bill be rejected. Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee? The Chair hears no objection, and the report is concurred in.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have in my hand a bill (S. No. 511) appropriating money to compensate Fisk Mills, sculptor, for the plaster model of General Rawlins, which was referred to the Committee on Claims. It is to pay Fisk Mills $15,000 for the preparation of a life-size plaster cast of the late General John A. Rawlins. There is accompanying the bill a petition, which prays that he be released from further obligation under his contract. It seems that this contract, if any, was made under a joint resolution of the two Houses approved the 14th of July, 1870, and that the work was to be done under the supervision of and the statue to be placed in such part of the city as should be directed by the Joint Committee of the two Houses on the Library. Your committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and under the circumstances I move that it be referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Durant H. L. Bell, of Kansas City, Missouri, asking compensation for property destroyed during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John G. Taylor, late collector of customs at Annapolis, Maryland, praying to be relieved from liability and responsibility for moneys paid to John R. Briscoe as surveyor of customs at the port of Nottingham, in the district of Annapolis, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 823) for the relief of John G. Taylor, of Annapolis, Maryland.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have in my hand the petitions of Peter Welch, Edward Welch, and Elizabeth Minion, praying compensation for property destroyed during the late war. These petitions were presented by the Senator from West Virginia nearest me, [Mr. DAVIS.] If I remember correctly, this morning he presented additional testimony in regard to these claims. The committee agree upon these three cases, and are prepared to make a report; but if the Senator from West Virginia prefers, I will withhold the reports for the present until we examine the additional testimony.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that would be the proper course to pursue in view of the additional evidence which I presented this morning and also a petition from the same parties in support of their claims. I concur with the chairman of the committee that it would be better to withhold the reports for the present.

Mr. WRIGHT. Very well.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 917) to amend section 4898 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hannah L. Lloyd, praying compensation for one-fourth interest in the Brig Fanny, seized and sold by the United States marshal in New York in 1862, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 824) for the relief of Hannah L. Lloyd as executrix and George W. King executor of William Lloyd, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 674) for the relief of W. H. Woodward, of Indianola, Texas, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back the bill (S. No. 186) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, as the Treasury Department has already paid the claim.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, reported a bill (S. No. 825) to provide for a more speedy adjustment of the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3136) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 829) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to submit a few remarks upon the general subject-matter to which the bill relates, and I should be very glad to do so to-day if the Senate would indulge me so far. If the honorable Senator from California will permit the bill to lie upon the table for the present, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. MITCHELL. In view of the business assigned for to-day, I give notice that to-morrow morning, after the morning business, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit a few remarks on the Chinese question.

Mr. SARGENT. Then it will not be necessary to retain this bill. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce. I am anxious to have it considered by the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then there will be nothing before the Senate for me to speak upon.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator makes as good a speech as I know he can make in favor of the bill, I shall be paid for waiting.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 831) requiring the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company from certain streets in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Bernard Pitzer, of Roanoke, Virginia, asking compensation for property taken and destroyed by the troops of the United States in 1863, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That J. T. Leary have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE, and Mr. MORRILL of Vermont, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER CULTURE ON WESTERN PRAIRIES.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask unanimous consent to call up House bill No. 2427. I think it will take but a moment. I doubt whether there will be any objection to the bill; but if there be I will not insist upon it at this moment, though I regard it as important that the bill should pass at once if at all.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies,'" approved March 13, 1874, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section amends section 3 of the act of March 13, 1874, by adding thereto the following further proviso:

Provided further, That whenever a party holding a claim under the provisions of this act, or whenever making final proof under the same, shall prove by two good and credible witnesses that the trees planted and growing on said claim were destroyed by grasshoppers during any one or more years while holding said claim, said year or years in which said trees were so destroyed shall not work any forfeiture of any of the rights or privileges conferred by this act; and the time allowed by this act in which to plant the trees and make final proof shall be extended the same number of years as the trees planted on the said claim were destroyed in the manner specified in this section.

The second section declares that the planting of seeds, nuts, or cuttings shall be considered a compliance with the provisions of the timber-culture act, but such seeds, nuts, or cuttings of the kind and for the purpose contemplated in the original act shall be properly and well planted, the ground properly prepared and cultivated; and in case such seeds, nuts, or cuttings should not germinate and grow, or should be destroyed by the depredations of grasshoppers, or from other inevitable accident, the ground shall be replanted or the vacancies filled within one year from the first planting. Parties claiming the benefit of these provisions are to prove, by two good and credible witnesses, that the ground was properly prepared and planted in such seeds, nuts, or cuttings, and were so destroyed by inevitable accident in such year.

The third section provides that it shall not be necessary to plant trees, seeds, nuts, or cuttings in one body, provided the several bodies, not exceeding four in number, planted, by measurement, aggregate the amount required and in time required by the original and amended act.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Secretary to be good enough to read the first part of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the first section.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the language speaks of "entries under this act." He ought to amend it so as to say, "or the act to which this is amendatory."

Mr. PADDOCK. It does not seem to me that that is essential; and as this is a House bill, if we amend it here, of course the consequence is to defer action; and it is important, if action is to be taken, that it shall be had at once. Large districts of the Western States, particularly in Kansas and Nebraska, were devastated by grasshoppers during the last year and the year preceding. Planting time is upon us, and the citizens are very anxious that the relief provided for in this bill may be granted at once, in order that they may resume planting. I trust my friend will not object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggested the amendment in the interest of the bill. As it stands, the bill, I fear, will be worthless, because it speaks of "entries under this act," and the act itself does not provide for any entries. I suggest that if the Senator incorporates the amendment, the bill will then speak for the other bill under which entries were made as well as this. I only make the suggestion in the interest of the bill; but if the Senator thinks otherwise, I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to hear from the Senator who has charge of the bill the effect of the second section, which changes the law materially, I believe.

Mr. PADDOCK. In reference to the planting of seeds and cuttings?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PADDOCK. In some districts it is impracticable to procure trees for resetting; but it is practicable to procure the seeds and the cuttings, and where it is practicable to get them in place of the trees, it is a surer means of securing timber in the end than by using the trees. The trees are liable, if procured at all, to be in a damaged state. In these districts the seeds and cuttings do better, and I think in the interest of timber culture it is better that that provision should be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF PRE-EMPTORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived——

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill No. 2452.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands proposed to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof inserting:

That whenever any pre-emptor on public lands or Indian reservations shall make satisfactory proof at the local land office, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, that the crops upon the lands occupied by him have been destroyed by grasshoppers within two years prior to the passage of this act, the time within which such pre-emptor is required to make final proof and payment is hereby extended two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. C. C. SNIFFIN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 8th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 761) to remove the political disabilities of James E. Slaughter, of Alabama, and on the 9th instant the act (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California.

NATCHEZ MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 699.

Mr. McDONALD. I must object to any further business in the morning hour. I think we had better proceed with the pending question in the trial of impeachment of Mr. Belknap.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator from Indiana will allow this bill to pass.

Mr. McDONALD. I will yield for this purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that after this matter is over—I do not know what it is—I shall call for the regular order of business.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 699) to confirm the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, Mississippi, are not required for the service of the United States; that the building has been for many years in a process of dilapidation and decay; and that the building and grounds have been offered for sale at different times by auction under and in pursuance of law. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to confirm to the highest bidder the sale made under his direction and in pursuance of law, February 15, 1876, it being satisfactorily shown to him that the building is to be reconstructed and devoted, under responsible auspices, to purposes of instruction for the benefit of the colored people of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, this bill it seems to me is very indefinite. I call upon the Senator from Vermont to give us some explanation. Was the property sold for any amount at all?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the building and grounds have already been sold, but it was at so low a price that the Secretary of the Treasury considered that it was safer to ask the consent of Congress to ratify the sale. The building is unroofed and is nearly destroyed, entirely useless; the floors are all broken up and the interior very much dilapidated; and probably this is about as large a sum as could be obtained for it in any way or manner; and it is not wanted by the Government for any purpose whatever. We have a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury approving of this proposition to have it sold.

Mr. BOGY. Does the Senator from Vermont know the amount obtained at that sale?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Somewhere about $5,000.

The bill was passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour fixed for that purpose having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will now be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask that the House proceed with the consideration of resolutions which have been laid over under the second call of the States and Territories.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next order of business will be the second "call of the States for resolutions, at which time bills may be introduced, and all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion." The previous unfinished business under this call is demanded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment to offer a resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. For reference?

Mr. PAGE. No, no; for adoption.

Mr. RANDALL. O, I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. I desire, then, to offer the resolution, and I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. If it takes no time I will not object.

Mr. PAGE. It will give rise to no discussion.

The resolution offered by Mr. PAGE was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the President be requested to submit to the Chinese government the following additional article to the existing treaty between the United States and the Chinese Empire, with an urgent pressing suggestion that it be accepted, namely, to wit, as follows: That the Government of the United States reserve the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent the immigration or importation of Chinese subjects into the United States, and that the empire of China also reserve the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent the immigration into the said empire of American citizens, anything in the existing treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that offered for reference?

Mr. PAGE. No; I want it passed.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to that.

Mr. PAGE. Cannot I move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the gentleman only holds the floor through the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PAGE. I will then ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There was no objection, and the resolution was so referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call up the resolutions offered on Monday under the second call, and I ask that the Clerk shall read the first resolution on the Calendar.

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

The first resolution on the Calendar was the one offered by Mr. O'BRIEN on December 14, 1875; which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, if not incompatible with the public interests, be directed to communicate to this House, at the earliest practicable moment, in what manner, with due regard to economy and dispatch of public business, the various duties now assigned to the Bureau of Internal Revenue may be absorbed by the Bureau under the charge of the Commissioner of Customs.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Upon that resolution I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted; there being upon a division ayes 91, noes not counted.

Mr. O'BRIEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask leave to report a resolution from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; not now. That would interrupt the regular order.

DISMISSAL OF EX-SENATOR JOHN B. HENDERSON.

The next resolution on the Calendar was the one offered by Mr. BUCKNER on December 14, 1875; which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the House all correspondence in reference to the dismissal of Ex-Senator John B. Henderson, of Missouri, as one of the special counsel of the United States in the prosecution of the whisky-fraud cases before the United States court at Saint Louis.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire under what rule of the House this matter comes before the House at the present time. I believe the invariable practice heretofore upon the second call is under the rule on page 150, that the States being first called for bills for reference and then in order for bills on leave and resolutions if anything gives rise to debate it goes over for discussion and the call continues; and I think the present occupant of the chair will remember that that rule has never been broken in upon.

Now, during the present session the first time the second call was started was on Monday last with the State of Maine, and a resolution was then introduced by myself upon which a vote was taken and the resolution was voted down. Now my point of order is that under the rule on page 150 nothing is in order on the second call of the States but the call for bills and resolutions, upon the passage of which the gentleman calling for the previous question can have a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the point of order before the House and anticipated the point. At the close of the first call for bills and resolutions during the morning hour the Chair called for the second call of the States under the rule precisely as on last Monday. The Chair at that time called the States for resolutions, when the gentleman from Maine was recognized. But if any member had demanded the unfinished business under that call the Chair would have been bound to recognize him, and the unfinished business which had come in previously under that call would have been first in order. Unfinished business is regarded as of high privilege and it must be concluded. The continuity and dispatch of the public business is the foundation of this rule. The Chair would refer to Rule 56, page 225 of the Digest:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

The Chair was therefore bound to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania to call for the conclusion of the unfinished business at this juncture, when the class of business to which it belongs is in order. This is that time.

Mr. HALE. Has that always been the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recollects that unfinished business of this character has been thus called up and disposed of.

Mr. HALE. My recollection is very clear that the whole morning hour has never been interfered with, but that the sixty minutes must be proceeded with in the two calls of the States, and I am borne out in that impression by the rule to be found on page 150.

Mr. RANDALL. Rule 56 is as clear as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that this is unfinished business, and he is informed by those who have practiced under this rule, and recorded our proceedings for years, that it has been the uniform practice that unfinished business under this call has always been taken up and disposed of.

Mr. HALE. Then it practically shuts out the second call of the States, which is a thing which I have never known to be done.

Mr. RANDALL. Practically it does not do any such thing; it practically disposes of resolutions under the call of the States which have been laid over.

Mr. HALE. But not under this call.

Mr. RANDALL. It is under this very call.

Mr. HALE. My recollection, if the Chair will allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will read the latter clause of Rule 56 he will be convinced.

Mr. HALE. I think the Chair will find upon investigation that the entire sixty minutes of the morning hour of Monday has never before been interfered with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is the only way to utilize the second call of States and to finish up the business commenced, and that goes over and should be concluded under this call. Besides, this proceeding has been going on without objection, and the point of order is too late and should not be sustained.

Mr. BUCKNER. I call the previous question upon the resolution just read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOAR. Is that resolution within the ruling of the Chair as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the second resolution upon the Calendar under the head "Resolutions where debate has arisen, and laid over under the rule."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. C. C. SNIFFEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 522) to define the tax on fermented or malt liquors;

An act (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the States of Missouri and Kansas from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872;

An act (H. R. No. 3269) appropriating $50,000 for subsistence supplies for Apache Indians in Arizona Territory, and for the removal of the Indians of the Chiricahua agency to San Carlos agency;

An act (H. R. No. 3356) authorizing the transfer of a certain appropriation;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) concerning special-tax stamps; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing the exhibition of a life-saving station-house at the centennial exposition.

DEFAULTERS.

The next resolution on the Calendar was the following, offered by Mr. HEREFORD:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish the House of Representatives with the following information, namely: The names of the various persons or officers whose accounts have not been settled, or who have been defaulters to the General Government since March 2, 1865, together with the amounts of each, and by whom appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. I call the previous question on that resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

WHISKY RINGS.

The next resolution upon the Calendar was the following, offered by Mr. RANDALL:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of all letters, telegrams, orders, and instructions relating to the organization and prosecution of the present movement against the so-called "whisky rings" at Saint Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee.

Mr. RANDALL. I call the previous question on that resolution.

Mr. FORT. I would suggest to the gentleman to insert the words "if not inconsistent with the public interest."

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that is necessary; there can be nothing in the information called for which Congress ought not to know.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not now in order, the previous question having been called. If the call for the previous question shall not be sustained, then an amendment would be in order.

The question was then taken upon seconding the previous question, and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 45.

No further count being insisted upon, the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOAR. Is a motion to suspend the rules now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has not yet expired.

Mr. RANDALL. That will not work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will expire at ten minutes past one o'clock.

The question was upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman will consent to make the resolution respectful, we will vote for it.

Mr. RANDALL. Respectful! We are hunting up testimony against those who have committed frauds.

Mr. HALE. The country will trust the Secretary of the Treasury twice where it will trust the other side of the House once.

Mr. FORT. You are very honest, all at once.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Let them have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to an amendment, to insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. FORT. He has already been requested to do that and refused.

Mr. RANDALL. If I had the disposition to do it I have not now the power, as the previous question is operating.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 67, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague, Mr. STENGER, is absent from his seat on account of important business.

Mr. DURAND. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALDRON. If present he would vote "no" and I should vote "ay."

Mr. SOUTHARD. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WILLARD. My colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, is absent on account of important business. If present he would, I presume, vote "no."

Mr. WIGGINTON. My colleague, Mr. LUTTRELL, and the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. LANE, are confined to their rooms by sickness.

Mr. BRADLEY. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HURD. If here, he would vote in the affirmative and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PACKER, who is absent on business, would, if here, vote "no." The gentlemen from Ohio, Mr. NEAL and Mr. WOODWORTH, are paired on this and similar questions.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I presume the Chair does so now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE.]

FRACTIONAL SILVER CURRENCY.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution which I send to the desk, and which has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such limits and regulations as will best secure a just and fair distribution of the same through the country, may issue the silver coin now in the Treasury to an amount not exceeding $10,000,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes; and the notes so received in exchange shall be kept as a special fund, separate and apart from all other money in the Treasury, and be re-issued only upon the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency received at the Treasury in payment of dues to the United States; and said fractional currency, when so substituted, shall be destroyed and held as part of the sinking fund, as provided in the act approved April 17, 1876.

Mr. STONE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 16, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair a sufficient number have not arisen.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. PAYNE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 38, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 73, not voting 82; as follows:

So the rules were not suspended, (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.)

During the vote,

Mr. DURAND stated that his colleague, Mr. WALDRON, was absent by leave of the House, and if present would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, stated that his colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, was absent by leave of the House, and if present he thought he would vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MRS. MINNIE SHERMAN FITCH.

Mr. MORRISON. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back a bill (S. No. 764) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to allow Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch to receive free from duties a wedding present from the Khedive of Egypt, with the recommendation that it do pass. I move to suspend the rules and put the bill upon its passage at this time.

Mr. FAULKNER. I object to the passage of that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was put to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks two-thirds have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FAULKNER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FAULKNER. I now demand a division on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 28.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRISON. The bill is passed, as my motion was to suspend all the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair declared the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill carried when the yeas and nays were demanded, and the yeas and nays being refused, the bill was passed of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Such is the fact. The gentleman from Illinois having moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the bill is therefore passed, the rules having been suspended for that purpose.

Mr. POPPLETON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to reconsider a suspension of the rules is not in order.

Mr. FAULKNER. Do I understand the Speaker to decide the yeas and nays cannot be ordered on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The official reporter of the RECORD and the Clerk both agree that the motion was to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and that motion the Chair declared to be carried when the yeas and nays were demanded, and not being ordered, the rules were accordingly suspended and the bill passed.

WHISKY RING.

Mr. HOAR. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has entire confidence in the wisdom, integrity, and efficiency with which the Secretary of the Treasury has prosecuted and is prosecuting that class of offenders against the revenue laws known as the "whisky ring," and does not desire him to make public any information in regard thereto which in his judgment will impair the efficiency of such prosecutions.

Mr. RANDALL. That reverses what the House has done. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. HOAR. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUCKNER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, rising to call up the District of Columbia business at the hour of two o'clock, under the rule, the Chair decides he has the absolute right to call it up to the exclusion of all other business. The third Monday of each month, after two o'clock, is set aside for that purpose; and it has always been held by every Speaker that that business is privileged over every other at that hour on the third Monday of each month.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose that the resolution on which I have moved a suspension of the rules is pending and will come up when it is again in order to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. PIPER. I desire to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Commerce, to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point that if I am taken off the floor by the gentleman from Missouri he cannot yield to other gentlemen.

Mr. BUCKNER. Very well. Then I yield the floor to my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE.]

CAPITOL, NORTH O ST. AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILOAD COMPANY.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 258) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company," approved March 3, 1875, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and allow said company to extend its line on Fourth and Eleventh streets west from O street to P street north, and to lay a single track and run its cars one way upon P street between Fourth and Eleventh streets, instead of laying a double track and running its cars both ways upon O street.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, the only object of this bill, which has come to us from the Senate, is to allow the O street road, as it is called, to build its track between Fourth and Eleventh streets, in the northern portion of the city on P street instead of O street. The company has one track on O street. That street is too narrow for two tracks, and it has been thought best in the interests of the property on those streets and the business of the city that the company be allowed to put one of its tracks on P street. I think there can be no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHOCTAW NATION OF INDIANS.

Mr. WILSHIRE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3463) for the relief of the Choctaw Nation of Indians; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2962) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington."

Mr. HENDEE. If no one asks for the reading of the bill, I will make a short explanation of its purpose.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the bill should be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, namely:

SECTION 1. That the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered to borrow, on the security of the real estate now owned by it in square No. 407, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, not exceeding the sum of $33,000, at a lawful rate of interest, for the purpose of paying off the debt now due from said joint stock company to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and to secure which said indebtedness the said Freedman's Savings and Trust Company now holds a deed of trust upon said real estate, the validity of which is doubted and is in dispute.

SEC. 2. That in order to secure the amount authorized to be borrowed by the preceding section, the said joint stock company is hereby authorized to execute and deliver its note for the amount borrowed under authority of this act, bearing such lawful rate of interest, and payable at such time, principal and interest, as may be agreed upon between it and the persons from whom it may borrow such money; and to secure the payment of such note and interest, to convey said property to two trustees in fee-simple, with power in said trustees, or the survivor of them, to sell said property at public auction, in case of default made in the payment of said note, or any installments of interest due thereon, upon such terms and after such notice by advertisement as the said trustees, or the survivor of them, may deem best for the interest of all parties concerned; and to convey the same to the purchaser in fee-simple.

SEC. 3. That the rents and revenues derived from said property shall be retained by the board of directors of said joint stock company, and applied to the payment of indebtedness hereby authorized, and shall not be applied to the payment of interest on the capital stock of said corporation until said indebtedness is fully paid.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing said joint stock company to encumber said real estate for any other purpose or in any other manner.

Mr. HENDEE. A short statement in explanation of this bill may be necessary. This joint-stock company built heretofore a fine building upon Ninth street in this city, and, after exhausting the money raised from stock subscriptions, borrowed of the Freedman's Bank $33,000. The Freedman's Bank has brought a suit against the institution to recover that money. The company has found an opportunity by which it can borrow sufficient to pay that debt. But in the original charter there is no power given by which they can encumber the property.

This bill simply gives the joint-stock company power to mortgage this property for the purpose of raising $33,000 to pay the debt which it owes to the Freedman's Bank. The Young Men's Christian Association is a small stockholder in the joint-stock company, but is not responsible for its acts, nor for any default which may have been allowed to occur by the stock company in regard to its loan from the Freedman's Bank.

I hope the bill may pass. It will allow the joint-stock company to borrow this money and pay the debt of the Freedman's Bank, which is now, I think, in a judgment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of any measure by which the Freedman's Bank can be put in the way of getting the money out of which it has been so long kept by this double-jointed association, which is sometimes called the building company of the Young Men's Christian Association, and sometimes the Young Men's Christian Association itself.

The explanation of the gentleman from Vermont is perhaps correct. I am not prepared to say it is not. But I would like to know what there is peculiar in this case requiring the passage of this bill? This building association is an incorporated body. What is there peculiar in the circumstances of this artificial person known as a corporation which makes it differ from any other? For without any special provision in the charter creating one of these artificial things known as a corporation, they all have the power to contract and be contracted with, to sue and be sued. I see no reason why this corporation should be different in this respect from every other. If there is any peculiarity about it, no doubt the gentleman from Vermont can point it out. At any rate I am not disposed to be very critical in this regard. If the object is, as I understand from the gentleman from Vermont, to enable these associations both combined, or either of them, to refund to the Freedman's Bank the money borrowed, I will go heartily hand in hand with the gentleman in favor of its passage.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman from Virginia has incidentally correctly stated the purpose of this bill. It has been usual in granting charters in this District to put in a provision by which property held by companies might be mortgaged or pledged for the security of money borrowed. But in this charter it was omitted. Now a suit has been brought for the recovery of the $33,000, and I think a judgment has been obtained this last week, although about that I am not certain. At any rate the case is pending in the courts, and if judgment be obtained for the amount, if it has not already been obtained, it will have to be paid to save a sale of the property. A party proposes to loan this corporation the $33,000, so that the Freedman's Bank may be paid immediately and without further cost; but good counsel have advised the company that it has no power to pledge its property for that purpose. The party will loan the money if he can be secured by a lien on the property. This bill, if passed, will inure to the benefit of the joint-stock company as well as to the Freedman's Bank.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question. The bill as explained meets my entire approval; but what guarantee is there that the Freedman's Bank will get the money?

Mr. HENDEE. The bill provides that the Freedman's Bank shall have the money and that the property shall be mortgaged to raise money for that purpose, and that it shall not be used for any other purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 159) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California;

An act (S. No. 168) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry;

An act (S. No. 199) for the relief of the estate of the late paymaster Major John S. Walker, United States Army; and

An act (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina.

RECORDING OF DEEDS, MORTGAGES, ETC.

Mr. CRAPO, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1922) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That sections 446 and 447 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, passed at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, 1873 and 1874, be, and the same hereby are, repealed; and there is enacted in lieu thereof the following:

All deeds, deeds of trust, mortgages, conveyances, covenants, agreements, or any instrument of writing which by law is entitled to be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds shall take effect and be valid, as to creditors, and as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, from the time when such deed, deed of trust, mortgage, conveyance, covenant, agreement, or instrument in writing shall have been acknowledged, proved, or certified, as the case may be, and delivered to the recorder of deeds for record, and from that time only.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

And the recorder of deeds shall note on each deed or other instrument of writing required by law to be recorded the time of delivery of the same to him to be recorded.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not be so construed as to affect any deed or other instrument of writing heretofore recorded.

Mr. CRAPO moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROBATE BUSINESS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CRAPO also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 3046) to amend the law with respect to wills, to regulate the transaction of probate business in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In section 5, line 5, strike out "three" and insert "four;" so that it will read, "between the hours of nine in the forenoon and four in the afternoon."

In section 2, line 69, insert the word "twenty" before the word "five;" so that it will read, "twenty-five."

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it better that the bill should be read as proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the register of wills of the District of Columbia is hereby declared to be an officer of the supreme court of said District, and shall hereafter be appointed by said court, and all official acts of said register, and all proceedings of said court holding a special term for orphans' court business, and all transcripts from the books or records of said register's office which require to be authenticated by seal, shall be so authenticated by the seal of said court and the signature of said register.

Thirty-first. For entering on the minutes of the court any order, judgment, decree, or sentence, of whatsoever nature, or making any other entry required by law to be made in said minutes, save those hereinbefore provided for, at the rate of fifteen cents for every hundred words or figures thereof.

Thirty-second. For recording any will, inventory, account, or other paper not hereinbefore specifically provided for, where the same is required by law or by order of court to be recorded, at the rate of ten cents for every one hundred words or figures thereof.

Thirty-third. For making any copies of any will, account, or any other paper whatsoever, when the same is demanded by the parties, and not otherwise, at the rate of ten cents for every one hundred words or figures thereof; but no fee shall be charged when the party himself makes a copy.

Thirty-fourth. For every certificate, under seal, not hereinbefore specially provided for, when the same is annexed to any paper at the request of any party, and not otherwise, twenty-five cents.

SEC. 3. That the said register shall keep a general docket, whereon shall be entered in order all causes, ex parte or otherwise, which shall hereafter be commenced in the special term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for orphans' court business, and all causes which are now pending therein, in which no account of administration or guardianship has yet been stated. And the said register shall cause to be entered upon said docket all proceedings had in any such cause, and shall also note therein, in plain figures, each and all fees chargeable by him in each cause, the amount of the fee to be set opposite the matter for which it is charged. And the said register shall cause to be recorded every will and testament admitted to probate in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That the said register shall, within three months from the passing of this act, set up in some conspicuous part of his office fair tables of the fees hereinbefore prescribed, on pain of forfeiting, for each day the same shall be missing through his neglect, the sum of $10, to be recovered by any one suing therefor in the same manner in which debts of the same amount are recovered.

SEC. 5. That for the purposes for which fees are chargeable as aforesaid and for inspection of the records made by the said register his office shall be open on all days, excepting legal holidays, between the hours of nine in the forenoon and four in the afternoon; that the salary, emoluments, and fees of said register shall not exceed the sum of $3,500 per annum, and the excess of fees collected by him, after defraying the necessary expenses of his office, including clerk hire, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; that the said register shall make semi-annual returns of the amount of fees received by him to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the accounts of his earnings and expenses shall be rendered and adjusted in the same manner and at the same times as the accounts of the clerk of said court are now by law required to be rendered and adjusted, and the said court shall have the same power to pronounce orders or decrees in the premises respecting said register that it has in like cases respecting the clerk.

SEC. 6. That all writs issued or ordered to issue by the justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia administering the orphans' court jurisdiction of said court shall be served by the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, who shall be allowed the following fees for such service, namely:

For serving a citation, summons, subpœna, or rule to show cause, for every person upon whom such service is had, fifty cents.

For serving an attachment, for each person served, $1.

For all other writs, the same fees which are now allowed by law for serving the same writs when issued by the justice holding the law or equity term of said court.

SEC. 7. That in all cases in which the court has no notice of an intention to contest the probate of a will or the granting of letters of administration, and in which one or more of the witnesses to the will appear in court to testify, or where the handwriting of such witness or witnesses, if not living or within the jurisdiction of the court, is proved in the manner now provided by law, and the party or parties named in the will as executor or executors, or entitled by law to letters of administration, furnish to the court, by the affidavit or oral testimony of a credible witness or witnesses, proof of the death of the testator or intestate, of his last place of abode or domicile, of the probable amount of his personal property, its character, and where located, of the identity of the party or parties applying for letters, and of his or her title to such letters, the court, in its discretion, may proceed to determine upon the evidence before it whether the will shall be admitted to probate or letters granted, without requiring notice to the devisees, legatees, or next of kin, by citation, publication, or otherwise, to be first given; and whenever any will is admitted to probate, the same shall be recorded, and the record thereof shall be prima facie evidence of any devise of real estate therein made in any suit, action, or proceeding instituted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, provided the record show that the said will was executed as by law required: Provided, That such probate shall not be regarded as prima facie evidence in any proceeding instituted to contest the validity of such will or testament.

SEC. 8. That every will hereafter made shall be construed with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

SEC. 9. That where any real estate shall be devised to any person without any words of limitation, such devise shall be construed to pass the whole estate or interest which the testator had power to dispose of by will in such real estate, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

SEC. 10. That every will or testament, made by a man or woman, shall be revoked by his or her marriage, (except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not, in default of such appointment, pass to his or her heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin, under the statute of distributions.)

SEC. 11. That no will or testament shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances.

SEC. 12. That in case a will be attested by a person to whom, or to whose wife or husband, any beneficial interest in any estate is thereby devised or bequeathed, if the will may not be otherwise proved, such person shall be deemed a competent witness, but such devise or bequest shall be void, except that, if such witness would be entitled to any share of the estate of the testator in case the will were not established, so much of his share shall be saved to him as shall not exceed the value of what is so devised or bequeathed.

SEC. 13. That from and after the passage of this act, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, when a devise, legacy, or bequest is made to a child or other relation of the testator, and the devisee or legatee dies before the testator, leaving issue who survive the testator, such issue shall take the estate so given in the same manner as the devisee or legatee would have done if he had survived the testator.

SEC. 14. That after the passage of this act two witnesses shall be sufficient to attest and subscribe any will made to devise real estate in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 15. That no will or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof or by a codicil showing an intention to revive the same; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked and afterward wholly revoked shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown.

SEC. 16. That no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will, of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death.

SEC. 17. That whenever a testator having no child living makes a last will and testament or a codicil wherein any child that he might thereafter have is not mentioned or provided for, and after the making thereof shall have a child born, whether in the life-time or after the death of the testator, and such testator shall die without making any provision by settlement or otherwise for the child so after born, the will and testament or codicil by him made, except so far as it provides for the payment of the debts of the testator and the necessary charges upon his estate, shall be construed as if the devisees and bequests therein made had been limited to take effect in the event that such child shall die under the age of twenty-one years unmarried and without issue.

SEC. 18. That, if a will be made when a testator has a child living and a child be born afterward, such after-born child, or any descendant of his, if not provided for by any settlement, and neither provided for nor expressly excluded by the will, but only pretermitted, shall succeed to such portion of the testator's estate as he would have been entitled to if the testator had died intestate; toward raising which portion the devisees and legatees shall, out of what is devised and bequeathed to them, contribute ratably, either in kind or in money, as a court of equity, in the particular case, may deem most proper. But if any such after-born child or descendant die under the age of twenty-one years, unmarried and without issue, his portion of the estate, or so much thereof as may remain unexpended in his support and education, shall revert to the person to whom it was given by the will.

SEC. 19. That the illegitimate child or children of any female, and the issue of any such illegitimate child or children, shall be able and capable in law to take and inherit both real and personal estate from their mother or from each other or from the descendants of each other, as the case may be, in like manner as if born in wedlock.

SEC. 20. That a special term be held every month of the year by the supreme court of the District of Columbia for the transaction of business appertaining to a probate or orphans' court; that one of the justices of said court may hold such special term, and shall sit for the transaction of its business at least twice a week. The said court shall have all the duties, powers, and jurisdiction which were devolved upon, vested in, and possessed by the judges of the orphans' court within the State of Maryland prior to the 27th day of February, 1801.

SEC. 21. That the supreme court of the District of Columbia, when holding a special term for the orphans' court business, shall have the like powers, jurisdiction, and authority for enforcing the attendance of persons required by it, and for punishing persons failing, neglecting, or refusing to produce deeds, evidences, or writings, or refusing to appear to be sworn or make affirmation or declaration, or to give evidence, or guilty of contempts, and generally for enforcing all orders, decrees, and judgments made or given by the court under this act or other acts of Congress in force, or acts of the assembly of the State of Maryland continued in force by any act of Congress, touching orphans' court matters, and otherwise in relation to the matters to be inquired into and done by or under the orders of the court as are or may hereafter be by law vested in the said court holding a special term for the hearing of equity suits and matters, for such purposes in relation to any suit or matter in equity depending.

SEC. 22. That any party aggrieved by an order, decree, or judgment of the court holding a special term for orphans' court business may appeal therefrom to the general term: Provided, That such appeal be made within thirty days after such order, decree, or judgment; and upon such appeal the general term shall review such order, decree, or judgment, and affirm, reverse, or modify the same, as shall be just.

SEC. 23. That in case a witness to a will shall be dead, insane, or incompetent to testify, the court holding the special term for orphans' court business, upon proof thereof, may, if it becomes necessary, take and receive proof of the handwriting of such witness, and of the handwriting of the testator, and of such other facts and circumstances as would be proper to prove such will on a trial at common law.

SEC. 24. That the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business shall have full and sole power and authority, subject to appeal to the general term, to order the sale of the real estate of the ward, or any part thereof, whenever the same may become necessary or expedient. The said court shall have like power and authority to permit the guardian to borrow money for the benefit and improvement of the ward's estate or for the maintenance and education of the ward, and to secure the same by the giving of a mortgage or deed of trust with power of sale on the ward's real estate, or some part thereof if, in the opinion of the court, the ward's interest in his property would thereby be better protected than by sale of the property. The said court shall exercise the power hereby conferred only when a petition for the purpose is presented by the guardian or next friend of the ward, showing proper cause for the exercise of the power, and supported by the testimony of one or more disinterested witnesses, which testimony shall be satisfactory to the court. The proceeds of all sales, whether made under the immediate direction of the court or by mortgagee, trustee, or trustees, under the mortgage or deed of trust given by the guardian shall be brought into court, and be held subject to its order, and all such sales shall be made subject to the confirmation of the court. Whenever the guardian shall borrow money for the ward by direction of the court, under this act, the kind of security, the amount thereof, the selection of trustee or trustees, if any, the terms of sale, and the provisions as to the distribution of proceeds shall be subject to the approval of the court, which may make any directions in respect to the security that may be necessary to keep the ward's interest in his property within the protection of the court holding the special term aforesaid.

SEC. 25. That a guardian having the care and custody of a ward's real property may lease the same for a term embracing any period of time within the nonage of the ward, provided he obtain the approval of the supreme court holding a special term for orphans' court business for any leasing of the ward's property for a term embracing a longer period of time than three years.

SEC. 26. That whenever any sale shall be made of any real estate by any executor or executors in pursuance of any authority, power, or direction contained in a will or codicil, or by force thereof, either for the payment of debts or of legacies, or for the support of children, or for the distribution of the proceeds, or for other purposes, the purchaser or purchasers of such real estate may, upon the court's order, pay the purchase-money or consideration of such sale into the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business, having the jurisdiction of the accounts of such executor or executors, or with leave of such court, to the executor or executors making the sale, to be by him or them disposed of according to the uses and trusts contained in such will or codicil, and any such payment shall be deemed valid against all persons having or who may have an interest therein: Provided, That before any such order shall be passed by the court or any act done by the court in the premises, the person or persons intrusted to sell the property shall give adequate security to the United States of America, to be approved by said court, conditioned for the faithful execution of the trust and proper application of all moneys to be received according to the uses and trusts of the will and the decree of the court, which security shall inure to the benefit of all parties interested; and upon such security being so given, no purchaser shall be bound to see to the application of the purchase-money, or be in any manner liable to be affected by the former trusts or limitations upon the premises.

SEC. 27. That no sale made by an executor or executors of land in the District of Columbia shall be valid or effectual unless ratified or confirmed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term for orphans' court business in the same manner practiced in cases of sales of land under decrees in equity; and the bond of any such executor or executors shall be answerable for the proceeds of sales of real estate which may come into his or their possession to the same extent as if it were personal estate in his or their hands. The said court shall require in the premises the same kind and amount of security as in cases of personal property.

SEC. 28. That where a devise or conveyance is made to two or more persons not trustees, the devisees or grantees shall take and hold as tenants in common and not as joint tenants, unless it is expressly stated or provided in said devise or conveyance that the property thereby devised or conveyed is to be held in joint tenancy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I called for the reading of that bill hoping that at this enlightened capital of the nation the general drift of legislation throughout the country for the last fifty years in regard to the administration of estates would have had a very full development, and that either the surrogate system or the prothonotary system with commissioners' powers would have been adopted as the system of administering probate matters in this District.

I do not think the gentleman who reports this bill is chargeable for this ancient system of legislation. He comes from New England, where the surrogate system had its origin. But I understand the truth to be that the bill was framed under the auspices of the learned bar of this city, and accommodates itself somewhat to the legislation of Maryland and Virginia. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] is well aware of the fact that the prothonotary system in all of its various forms, wherever adopted, has continued to be the system of administrating the probate laws in the various States of the Union; that it has been found far the most effective system that has been devised, and that the system of authorizing or throwing probate business to the courts of general jurisdiction has been found to leave the business in the hands of persons not invested with judicial powers. The court itself gives but little attention to that class of business.

There are States where the adoption of the prothonotary system could not be possible in counties where there is a sparseness of population, but I believe that in every State where the population justifies it a system corresponding with the prothonotary system has been adopted and found admirably adapted to that class of business, while the fact of throwing that class of business into the courts of general jurisdiction is to have this class of business to be administered by the clerk alone. If the clerk were invested with judicial powers and his office was increased in responsibility it would almost certainly secure an efficient officer for the discharge of these duties, because the handsome salary proposed to be paid here, $5,000 a year, would secure very efficient and good officers. I regret that that system has not been adopted, but at the same time I did not rise to antagonize the bill. I trust that we shall soon see this register of wills converted into a prothonotary or surrogate or judge, with power to administer the business of his own office with the right of appeal.

Mr. CRAPO. It is true, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says, that this bill was first prepared under the auspices of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia; but it has been subjected to, and has received, such changes and modifications as have seemed best to the Committee for the District of Columbia. It was thought that lawyers residing here in the District and practicing here were more familiar with the features of the present system and better aware of the methods necessary to be adopted to obviate the defects of that system and to meet the wants of the people of the District than strangers would be.

It will not be necessary for me to explain the bill in detail, section by section; a simple statement of its general character and purpose I think will be sufficient. By reference to the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, it will be seen that there are no special, expressed statutory provisions relating to the disposition of property by will or to the distribution of intestate effects. There are provisions in the statutes relating to the appointment of administrators, executors, and guardians, the giving of bonds by them, their qualifications, and the proper methods of administering their trusts. But concerning the distribution of property, both of persons dying testate and persons dying intestate, there is nothing in the statutes of the District of Columbia except by reference, as stated in section ninety-two, which reads as follows:

> The laws of the State of Maryland, not inconsistent with this title, as the same existed on the 23d day of February, 1801, except as since modified or repealed by Congress, or by the authority thereof, shall continue in force within the District.

The law governing the disposition of property, both real and personal, of persons deceased in the District is the law of Maryland as it existed in 1801. Since that time, during the past seventy-five years, there have been of course many changes in the Maryland code, as there has been in the laws of the several States, upon this subject. In this branch of the law, as in other branches, there has been much progress; but in that progress the District has not shared. The result is a system of probate law in this District which is antiquated, inadequate, and entirely unsuited to the present time.

I will cite a single example. Under the present law in this District—that is, the law of Maryland of 1801—a will relates only to the specific property the testator held at the date of the making of the will. All subsequently acquired property and all property changed by sale and re-investment was not operated upon by the will; that is, such subsequently acquired is treated as outside of the will and is subject to the laws of distribution as intestate assets. This is simply one illustration of the imperfection of the present probate laws of this District when compared with more modern legislation upon the subject.

The provisions of this bill relating to wills and their legal effect and to the distribution of property are similar to the statutes of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, the States which are in the immediate neighborhood of the District and with which the people of the District are in the closest relations both personally and socially.

The probate law of this District was formerly administered under an orphans' court as a separate court. By an act of Congress, approved June 21, 1870, the orphans' court of this District was abolished, and all the powers and duties of such orphans' court were transferred to the supreme court of the District of Columbia. While some of the provisions of the act of 1870 were incorporated in the revised code for this District, the provision conferring upon the supreme court of the District the jurisdiction of the orphans' court was omitted, or, if not omitted, it was not stated in express terms. This omission has raised a doubt as to the jurisdiction of the supreme court in probate matters. The bill now under consideration remedies this omission and doubt.

Under the law of 1870 abolishing the orphans' court it was provided (chapter 141, section 5) that nothing in that act should be construed as abolishing the office of register of wills. The bill now under consideration does not abolish that office or interfere with it. The present register of wills, who, I understand, is discharging his duties acceptably and satisfactorily, still remains under this bill as register of wills. The change made is with reference to the future appointment of that officer. In case of a vacancy, the office is to be filled by appointment of the judges of the supreme court of the District rather than by nomination of the President, as is now the case.

There is a change made by this bill in the fee bill for the transaction of probate business. Under the present law there is no accounting by the register of wills for the fees which he receives; there is no docket kept showing the amount of fees in each particular case. It is provided by their bill that all fees received by him shall be docketed, so that their amount may be known, and that he shall account for those fees to the Government of the United States.

Under the present law, the register of wills has received all the fees of the office, paying from them the clerical service which he has employed; and the balance has been taken for his own compensation. There is no exact or accurate means of knowing just what the amount of that compensation has been; but this bill provides that while all the fees shall be accounted for and turned into the Treasury, the compensation of this officer shall be limited to $3,500 a year.

There has been a reduction in the fee bill. The amounts charged for various services in the probate office were fixed by statute in 1824, and have remained with but slight modifications until the present time. The committee have thought that with the increase of population and property in the District those fees might be somewhat reduced; and they have been reduced upon the principle which has been thought to be correct, that while the fees should make the office self-supporting, it should not be made specially the source of revenue either to the District or to the General Government. The amendments proposed by the committee are simply formal; and, unless some gentlemen desire to ask questions with reference to the bill, I ask that it be put on its passage.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3368) appropriating $9,000 to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Offices in Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 13, 1874.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 699) to confirm the sale of the marine-hospital building and grounds at Natchez, in the State of Mississippi.

INTERMENTS IN CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. WILLARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 679) relative to interments in the Congressional Cemetery.

The bill was read. It provides that hereafter, whenever any deceased Senator or member of the House of Representatives shall be actually interred in the Congressional Cemetery, so called, it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate in the case of a Senator, and of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives in the case of a member of the House, to have a monument erected of granite, in the form of the cenotaph heretofore provided, with suitable inscriptions, and the cost of the same shall be a charge upon and paid out either from the contingent fund of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, to whichever the deceased may have belonged, and any existing omissions of monuments or inscriptions are authorized to be supplied in like manner. All previous laws upon the subject of monuments in the Congressional Cemetery are repealed.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the gentleman having charge of this bill would allow an amendment to strike out the provision that all monuments hereafter to be erected shall be in the form of the cenotaph heretofore provided. It is certainly adding new terror to death to propose that in any contingency, whatever may be the poverty or degradation of any member of Congress, his body should be put under a structure similar to the cenotaphs now there, which are only excusable on the ground that nobody is buried under them. I cannot conceive of an uglier shape to be made out of granite or marble than those cenotaphs now there. To propose gravely to require by law that for all time structures of that fashion shall be placed over deceased Congressmen seems to me a little too bad. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "in the form of the cenotaph heretofore provided."

Mr. WILLARD. I do not know that I have any objection to this amendment. I suppose that the words which the gentleman proposes to strike out were put in the bill with the idea of making the new monuments correspond in shape with those already erected. But I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONDEMNATION OF GROUND FOR AN ALLEY.

Mr. WILLARD also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 293) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cancel and annul the condemnation of ground in square 762, in the city of Washington, for a public alley, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

The first section authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cancel and annul the condemnation of ground in square 762, in the city of Washington, for the purpose of locating a public alley in that square, should they deem the abandonment of the projected alley compatible with the interests of the public; but the abandonment is only to be made upon the petition of a majority of the residents and owners of the property in that square.

The second section directs that the commissioners shall take steps to recover into the treasury of the District of Columbia any damages paid to any person or persons occupying or owning property in the square named where the property of said person or persons has been in no manner interfered with or damaged; and that, upon such recovery, the commissioners shall refund any benefits assessed against any person or persons owning or occupying property in the square, provided such benefits shall have been paid.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. E. HALL.

Mr. CATE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2501) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of Dr. David A. Hall, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the commissioners of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia to pay out of moneys in their hands to the legal representatives of the estate of Mrs. A. E. Hall, widow of David A. Hall, deceased, the sum of $1,955, being the amount found to be due the estate of said David A. Hall by the accounting officers of said District, pursuant to the opinion of the attorney of said District in relation to the liability of said District to said estate for taxes collected and illegally detained from said deceased, and interest thereon.

Mr. CATE. I will make a brief statement of the facts in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve the question of order on this bill.

Mr. CATE. Before proceeding with my remarks, I will allow the question of order to be decided as to whether this bill can be considered in the House or must under the rule be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BUCKNER. This bill does not affect, as I understand, the funds of the Government at all, but only the funds of the District in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioners. I have been advised by my friend that he did not think it was a case of that sort which under the rules must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not hear the bill distinctly when it was read, and do not know whether it merely directs money of the District to be paid by the sinking-fund commissioners or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands this money has been heretofore appropriated by Congress, and that this bill merely proposes the payment out of a fund already in the hands of the commissioners belonging to the District.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this money had been appropriated heretofore out of the Treasury and placed under the control of the commissioners of the sinking fund of this District, then the application of that money by this bill would come within the rule adopted at the first session of the last Congress, although not covered by the former rule. That rule applied not only to appropriations of money out of the Treasury but to bills requiring payment out of appropriations previously made. I do not recollect the number of the rule.

Mr. BUCKNER. Rule 112.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rule 112. If this is the money of the District of Columbia and not appropriated out of the national Treasury, then I concede the point of order does not lie.

Mr. BUCKNER. The sinking-fund commissioners of this District have no other funds than those arising from the collection of taxes in this District.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not persist on the point of order, in that event.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Rule 112 provides that all proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HOLMAN. On reflection I wish to state that I do desire a ruling of the Chair on this point, as there seems to be great diversity of opinion on the subject. If this fund has never been covered into the Treasury and never appropriated out of the Treasury, the rule would not seem to apply to it. The question is raised, if this is a District fund, why Congress should direct its application, and why, on the contrary, it should not be disposed of in conformity with general law instead of by special enactment, as is now proposed?

Mr. BUCKNER. Because there is no law for the purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia is able to state to the House, as I understand he is, that this money was never appropriated out of the national Treasury, and is a fund which came into the hands of the sinking-fund commissioners from the tax-payers of the District, then I suppose the rule which was intended to protect the public funds of the United States would not have any application.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is the fact. As I understand it, this is a fund in the hands of the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the Government of the United States has nothing to do with it. It is a matter partly belonging to the District of Columbia, and is not covered by the rule.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to ask my colleague what is his source of information on that subject? Is it entirely reliable that this has not been appropriated at any time out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BUCKNER. As I understand it, it has not been appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States. The sinking-fund commissioners are not authorized to have any funds belonging to the Government of the United States.

Mr. GLOVER. I did not know but what the money appropriated from the Treasury of the United States by Congress went into a common fund made up partly of appropriations from the Treasury and partly of taxes collected from the people of the District.

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point is an interesting one, and I ask for the decision of the Chair. It is important in view of the relations the Government holds toward this District and the extent to which the General Government is responsible for the application of the funds of the District.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has this money ever been covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. BUCKNER. I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not know positively.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order under that part of the one hundred and twelfth rule which provides that bills authorizing payments out of appropriations already made must have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole House. There has been an appropriation already made, and this therefore must go to that committee. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HENDEE. Is it not customary on District of Columbia day to move to go into Committee of the Whole, and when the House has resolved itself into committee is not the only business in order the District of Columbia business on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair makes no ruling about that till the matter comes up.

Mr. CATE. Is the bill before the House for consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not, under the ruling of the Chair.

ELLA LONG.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back the petition of Ella Long, praying Congress to pass a law making her the lawful heir of Jeremiah D. Long, together with a bill carrying out the object of the petition.

The bill (H. R. No. 3464) for the relief of Ella Long was received and read a first and second time.

The bill declares Ella Long, of the city of Washington and District of Columbia, the illegitimate child of Daniel Long and Margaret Haggerty, both deceased, the heir of her illegitimate brother, Jeremiah D. Long, deceased, in like manner and degree as though both were born in lawful wedlock.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I can explain in a few words the object of this bill without, I think, the necessity of having the petition read. The petitioner, Ella Long, and her brother, Jeremiah D. Long, were the illegitimate children of their parents. Jeremiah D. Long has died, leaving no children, and leaving a small piece of property in this city. By the law of the District of Columbia as it now stands this petitioner cannot inherit this property from her illegitimate brother. This bill simply provides that she shall stand in the position of heir to her brother, just as she would have done if they had both been born in lawful wedlock. That is the only purpose of this bill.

Mr. EDEN. Does any one else claim the title to this property?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. No, sir; if the title is not given to the petitioner in this way the property by the law of the District escheats to the Government. It is proposed by this bill that she shall be the heir to her brother's property, and that it shall not escheat to the Government. That is the sole purpose of the bill. If no further explanation is desired, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HIGHWAY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HENKLE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2881) to authorize the establishment of a certain free public highway in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed, within thirty days after the passage of this act, to locate, construct, and maintain a free public highway on and over that part of the Georgetown and Rockville turnpike-road which leads from the boundary of the city of Georgetown to the boundary of the District of Columbia, toward Rockville, the county seat of Montgomery County, Maryland, and which is styled the Washington Turnpike Company, described in the act of Congress approved February 27, 1813, (volume 2 of the Statutes at Large, page 808,) incorporating said turnpike-road as the line of the most direct and practicable route from the boundary of Georgetown to the boundary of the District of Columbia; and for the purpose aforesaid the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power to take any real estate or franchise of said turnpike company necessary for the construction and maintenance of a free public highway, and no more.

SEC. 2. That just compensation shall be made to said turnpike company for the real estate and franchise so taken, and which compensation shall be ascertained, either by jury or arbitrators, selected by the marshal of the District of Columbia, after due notice be given to the president and directors of the turnpike company, proceed under oath to assess the damages due the said company, which shall be paid by said commissioners out of the general fund of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That in fixing the measure of damages and in fixing the present value of the franchise of said turnpike company, the jury or arbitrators, as the case may be, shall take in consideration the question whether such franchise has been forfeited in any manner by said company.

The amendments reported by the committee were as follows:

Strike out sections 2 and 3, and insert at the end of the first section the following:

Provided, however, That the president and directors of the said Washington Turnpike Company shall surrender and convey to the commissioners of the District of Columbia all the real estate and franchises to them now belonging and necessary for the construction and maintenance of the aforesaid free public highway free of cost to the District of Columbia.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUBURBAN RAILROAD COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENKLE also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2604) to incorporate the Suburban Railroad Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That George E. Kennedy, G. W. Browning, Hawkins Taylor, Robert K. Elliot, Sayles J. Brown, B. F. Guy, J. Q. Howard, Henry L. Carlton, William C. Dodge, Jos. B. Bryan, John J. Johnson, Charles Kennedy, George W. Linville, William J. Murtagh, Amos Hunt, W. G. Palmer, Appleton P. Clark, and H. Nelson Chapman, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name, style, and title of the Suburban Railway Company of Washington in the District of Columbia, with power to sue and subject of being sued, plead and being impleaded, and cause to be made a common seal, and the same to alter at pleasure, with authority to construct a single or double track railway, with the necessary appurtenances, within the city of Washington, in said District, and through and along the following-named street, avenue, and highway, to wit: Commencing at or near the center of the crossing of C street northeast and Delaware avenue, thence in an easterly direction on said street to its intersection with Maryland avenue, thence through Maryland avenue to its intersection with the highway formerly owned by the Columbia Turnpike corporation, thence continuing on the right side of said highway to the line of said District, with the right to run public carriages thereon propelled by either horse, steam, or other improved motor power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding five cents a passenger within the city limits and five cents additional to the line of the District.

SEC. 2. That the said railway shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real and personal property, shall be liable to taxation as other real estate and personal property.

SEC. 3. That the portion of said railway as shall be laid within said city shall be laid in conformity to the requirements imposed by law upon similar railways therein, (unless when said railway shall be constructed on the tram-system,) and shall be provided with rails of the most improved pattern and of a gauge not less than three feet in width.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall prevent the Government of the United States from altering the grade or otherwise improving the street, avenue, and highway occupied by said railway; and in such event it shall be the duty of said railway company to conform to such alterations and improvements.

SEC. 5. That the capital of said company shall not exceed $250,000, to be divided into shares of $50 each, and shall be deemed personal property, and transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company shall direct.

SEC. 6. That the said company shall furnish convenient and comfortable cars for use on said road, and shall run the same interchangeably, at least one in every hour, from six o'clock in the forenoon to the hour of midnight of the same day, reserving as an intermission one hour to be divided by the meridian, and shall provide passenger-rooms, ticket-offices, and stations, as the business of said company may require. And said company is authorized to construct all necessary railways through transverse streets and roads for the purpose of connecting said stations with the main track; and said company is authorized to purchase or lease such lands and buildings as are necessary for the purposes mentioned in this section.

SEC. 7. That within ninety days after the passage of this act the corporators named herein, or a majority of them, or, if any refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to so much of the capital stock of said company as shall be necessary to build and equip a single track of said railway, the amount to be determined by said corporators, to be opened and to be kept open in some convenient place or places in the city of Washington, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give public notice by advertisement in some daily paper published in said city of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to said stock shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no one person shall be allowed to subscribe for more than two hundred shares: Provided further, That each subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing 25 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the treasurer appointed by said corporators, or said subscription shall be null and void. If, at the end of twenty days, a larger amount than is estimated to be sufficient to construct and equip the railway as aforesaid shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed, and the corporators herein named shall proceed to apportion the stock so taken among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be completed on the day the books are closed: Provided, That nothing shall be received in payment of the percentage as aforesaid but money. When the books of subscription of stock shall be closed as aforesaid, the corporators, or a majority of them, and, in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within ten days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in some daily paper published in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notices to each stockholder by the secretary of the corporation. And in all meetings of stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, which may be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 8. That the government of the affairs of said company shall be vested in a board of directors, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold office for one year, and until others are duly elected and inducted to take their places. A majority of said directors, the president being one, shall constitute a quorum, shall elect a president of the board, who shall be president of the company; they shall also choose a secretary and a treasurer, the latter giving bond with security to said company, in such sum as shall be prescribed by the directors, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy occurring in said board by death, resignation, or otherwise, the same shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 9. That the directors shall have power to make such by-laws and regulations as shall be needful respecting the disposition and management of the stock, estate, and effects of said company, not contrary to this act or the laws of the United States, and especially those enacted for the government of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the directors of said corporation shall have power to require the subscribers to the stock to pay the amount subscribed at such time, (after the first installment,) in such manner, and in such amounts as they may deem proper; and, if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by resolution of the board of directors after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installments, under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said corporation, or said body corporate may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 10. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for the choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place and under such conditions as the directors shall prescribe; and the said directors shall make detailed reports annually of their doings to the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 11. That all persons exercising municipal authority in said District, the officers or agents of any body corporate within said District, are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railway as herein authorized.

SEC. 12. That the said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of said railway. And if any person or persons shall willfully obstruct or impede the passage of, or destroy or injure, the cars, depots, stations, or any other property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of $10 to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties are in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within ninety days after said offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 13. That the construction of said railway shall be completed within three years after the said company shall have organized and have consolidated with some foreign company desiring the same; otherwise all rights and privileges herein contained shall cease and be determined.

SEC. 14. That no person shall be prohibited the privilege to travel on any part of said railway, or ejected from the cars thereof, for any other cause than that of being drunk, disorderly, unclean, contagiously diseased, refusing to pay the legal fare demanded, or to comply with the general regulations of the company.

SEC. 15. That the stockholders of said company shall be liable individually for all the debts and liabilities of said company to an amount equal to the amount of stock held by such stockholder.

SEC. 16. That for the purpose of readily constructing and equipping said railway the said company is hereby fully authorized to borrow money to any amount not exceeding $100,000, at a rate of interest not to exceed 8 per cent. thereon, payable semi-annually, and to issue coupon bonds therefor in sums not less than $100, and, to secure the payment of said bonds and the interest accruing thereon, shall execute and deliver, to such trustee or trustees as shall be selected by the president and directors of said company, a mortgage or mortgages of all or any part of the property belonging to said company.

SEC. 17. That the transit of the cars of said company on any portion of said railway within the city limits shall not exceed five miles per hour, unless the railway shall have been constructed on the tramway principle, when the speed of transit may be regulated by the board of directors of said company: Provided always, That at all crossings the momentum of the cars shall be reduced to a rate so slow as to be instantly stopped, and when receiving and discharging passengers the motion of the cars shall cease.

SEC. 18. That to obviate as far as possible any impediment in the free and unobstructed use of the highway aforesaid by the public, the said railway shall be constructed on the right side of the highway leading from the city limits and next adjoining the adjacent property; and should the business or the safety and convenience of the said railway require an additional track, the said company may apply to the proper authorities of said District for permission to appropriate a strip of land lying next adjacent to said railway, in width not exceeding twenty-five feet, the mode of proceeding to be regulated by the laws now in force for condemning lands to public uses.

SEC. 19. That whenever the line of any railway in the State of Maryland has been or may be constructed so as to admit the passage of burden or passenger cars over the railway herein established without break or interruption, said railway company is hereby authorized to consolidate itself with such foreign corporation by entering into an arrangement, under the corporate seal of each, prescribing the terms and conditions thereof, the mode of carrying the same into effect, the name of the new corporation, the number of its directors, which shall not exceed thirteen nor in a less number than seven, the time and place of holding the first election of directors, to fix and establish the capital stock of said company, not exceeding $300,000, the shares being limited in amount to $50, the manner of converting the shares of capital stock in each of said corporations into shares in such new corporation, the manner of compensating stockholders in each of said corporations who refuse to convert their stock into the stock of the new corporation, with such other details as shall be deemed necessary to perfect the consolidation of said corporation; and such new corporation shall possess all the powers, rights, and franchises conferred originally upon said corporations, and shall be subject to all the restrictions and perform all the duties imposed by this act.

SEC. 20. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE WYLIE.

Mr. KNOTT. I observe that in the order of the House on Saturday appointing a special committee in relation to the memorial of Albert Grant requesting an investigation into the official conduct of Judge Wylie there is no suggestion as to the number of which the select committee shall be composed. I move that it be composed of seven members.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair names the following members to act as such special committee: Mr. WARREN of Massachusetts, Mr. FINLEY of Florida, Mr. LE MOYNE of Illinois, Mr. WILLIAMS of Alabama, Mr. CUTLER of New Jersey, Mr. CROUNSE of Nebraska, and Mr. LEAVENWORTH of New York.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HENKLE also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3435) providing for the adjustment of claims against the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

That immediately upon the passage of this act, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall appoint one suitable person, a tax-payer of the District of Columbia, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, appoint two such persons, and the three persons so appointed shall be known as and styled District claims commissioners; and each of them, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall make oath, in legal form, before a notary public for the District of Columbia, that he will discharge the duties of his office justly and without fear or favor; and shall likewise give bond to the Government of the United States in the penal sum of $20,000, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said claims commissioners, immediately upon entering upon the discharge of the duties of their office, to give notice by advertisement for ten consecutive days, Sundays being excluded, in two daily newspapers published in said District of Columbia, for all persons having claims against said District of Columbia to present the same before the said claims commission, in writing, under oath, for their examination and adjustment; such presentation to be made within sixty days from and after the first publication of said advertisement; and the said claims commissioners, before considering any such claim, shall require the same to be supported by the testimony of witnesses, in writing, under oath, or by official vouchers and documents, as the case may be; and shall likewise require satisfactory proof, to be produced by such claimant, under oath, that such claim has never been before presented for audit, adjustment, or payment, either to the late board of public works of said District, or to the board of audit created by act of Congress entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, A. D. 1874, or if such claim has been presented that it has not been adjudicated upon its merits.

SEC. 3. That the said claims commissioners, for the purposes in this act specified, shall have power to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance, administer oaths, and examine witnesses under oath; and shall have full access to all the records, books, papers, and vouchers of every kind whatsoever of the late board of public works, and of the District of Columbia, and of the commissioners of said District, and of the engineer of said District.

SEC. 4. That the said claims commissioners shall carefully examine into all the facts and circumstances pertaining to each claim that may be properly presented in conformity with the provisions of the second section of this act; and likewise carefully consider the proofs and evidence submitted in support thereof, and determine the amount, if any, that may be due and owing thereon; shall make a detailed and tabular statement of all claims presented, together with their action thereon; and such statement shall contain the name of the claimant, the nature of the claim, the date of the contract and agreement upon which said claim is based, if such claim arises out of any contract or agreement; the names of the original parties to such agreement or contract, the name of the assignee of such contract or agreement, if such contract or agreement has been assigned; the price to be paid, as stipulated in such agreement or contract, and whether such price was to be paid in money or in bonds, and if in bonds or other evidences of indebtedness, the kind and character thereof; the amounts or amount already paid on such claim, and whether in cash or in bonds; and said claims commissioners shall report their proceedings from time to time to Congress in the manner aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That said claims commissioners shall have authority to receive, consider, determine, and report upon, as herein provided, all claims for work and labor performed, or materials furnished, upon any order of the board of public works, or order of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or founded upon any contract or agreement made by virtue of any act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia with the board of health of said District or said board of public works; or founded upon any contract or agreement made with the present commissioners of said District, or late board of public works, or the authorities of the late government of the District of Columbia; and all claims for special damages to real property in the District of Columbia, arising out of injuries to such property, caused by improvements or repairs, made by the said board of public works, or said commissioners, or government of the District of Columbia, or Government of the United States; and also all claims for labor performed on public improvements on the streets and excavations of Washington under direction of the board of public works of the District of Columbia, or the contractors of the same, by any person employed by said board of public works or by said contractors, and for which labor it shall be claimed the United States is liable under a proviso in the act of June 23, 1874, appropriating the sum of $75,000 for the payment of workingmen employed on said public improvements; but in determining upon any claim founded upon any special damages arising out of injuries to real property, said claims commissioners shall take into consideration and allow as a proper offset to any such claim for injuries any direct and special benefits or advantages resulting to such property by reason of such improvement or repairs.

SEC. 6. That said claims commissioners may employ one accountant, who shall also act as their secretary, at not more than $100 per month. They also have power to issue subpœna for witnesses, and compel their attendance by attachment or otherwise, and fix their compensation; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners in all cases to view the premises in question before making a final disposition of the case. They shall be allowed for their services $5 per day for the time necessarily and actually employed under the provisions of this act, and such necessary expenses and disbursements as may be necessary for the due execution of the powers hereby conferred. And the said commissioners shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the costs, expenses, salaries, disbursements, and fees of witnesses necessarily incurred under this act, and the said Secretary shall pay the same out of the funds of the said District of Columbia: Provided, That the term of office of the said claims commissioners shall not extend beyond the 1st day of January, 1877.

SEC. 7. That said claims commissioners, before proceeding to the examination and adjustment of any claims for special damages to real property in the District of Columbia arising out of injuries to such property caused by improvements or repairs, as provided in the fifth section of this act, shall first consider and adjust all claims for work or labor performed or materials furnished upon any order of the board of public works, or order of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or founded upon any contract or agreement made by virtue of any act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia with the board of health of said District or said board of public works, or the authorities of the late government of the District of Columbia, and report the same to Congress: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to make the United States Government liable for the payment of the whole or any part of the claims herein authorized to be presented, considered, and adjusted.

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HENKLE. This is an important bill, and perhaps requires some explanation. The object of it is to appoint a board of District claims commissioners, two of whom are to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, and one by the President of the Senate. Their duty is to examine into the claims, the outstanding, unadjusted claims against the District of Columbia.

There are a multitude of claims of various kinds and character outstanding and unadjusted against the District of Columbia. As soon as the Committee for the District of Columbia entered upon the discharge of their duties they were beset by a swarm of persons presenting claims of various characters, requiring for a thorough investigation an amount of application and research that no committee of Congress could ever have the time to devote to such an investigation, and very few committees would be capable of completing such an investigation in a satisfactory manner, for to discharge that duty in a satisfactory manner would require a very intimate acquaintance with the affairs of this District.

There are perhaps two or three hundred of these claims for contract work done, claims that have not been settled, that have been open and unsettled for two or three years. In many instances those who have done work, and done it most faithfully, have been the victims of the mismanagement of the public affairs of the District, and many men have gone into bankruptcy and been rendered insolvent because their just claims have not been adjudicated and paid by the authorities of the District. Many cases of this kind have come to the knowledge of the committee. There are other cases no doubt that have no merit, that are not just and proper, but the committee were unable to discriminate between these cases for want of time and for want of the necessary information. There is a large number of claims for damages done to property by the changes of grade and filling up which have been done all over the cities of Washington and Georgetown in the improvements which have been made in the last three, four, or five years. It is desirable that in the chaotic condition of public affairs in the District of Columbia there should be some authority somewhere with some competent power to investigate thoroughly, candidly, fairly, and judicially all these claims, and to present them to Congress in a tabular form in a concise and proper manner, so that Congress may be able to legislate, if necessary, for their payment.

The provision of this bill is simply that three commissioners shall be appointed, as I stated, and that they shall give notice in two public papers of this District where claims may be heard, and that they shall investigate all claims that may be presented carefully, all in regard to the matter of contracts, all in regard to the matter of services performed, the payments if any made, and assignments if any made, and everything pertaining to the nature of the claims, and present them to Congress in their report in such form that Congress shall be enabled to legislate intelligently on the subject. As I have said, there is a great necessity for this action. I know the disposition of Congress to provide for the payment of every debt justly due to honest claimants in the District of Columbia; but it is impossible to discriminate without such information by parties who are residents here and who are familiar with other parties in the District of Columbia what claims are just and what are unjust.

This bill does not take any money out of the Treasury. The report of the commissioners is not to be conclusive. They are simply to investigate these matters, and report the nature and character of these claims to Congress, when they are prepared so to report. This bill, I may say, is acceptable to the parties having claims against the District of Columbia. They say that it is the only practical way by which their claims are able to be adjusted. They know that it would be utterly impossible for Congress to pass a bill for the relief of every individual who has a claim in the District. We were beset and besought by individuals at the commencement of this session asking us to report bills for their relief, and we soon saw that it would be a Herculean work, and that it would be impossible for Congress to pass bills for the relief of individual claimants. The only relief then apparent was to provide a proper commission to investigate these matters and, if Congress sees fit, to provide by legislation hereafter to compensate and pay them in the manner thought best. There is no money taken by this bill from the Treasury; even the expenses of this commission are to be paid by the Treasurer of the United States out of the funds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. I do not propose to antagonize the bill, but I understand it proposes the appointment of officers by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. Now, what does the gentleman do with this clause of the Constitution:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Now the Speaker of the House is not the head of a department.

Mr. HENDEE. These are not officers at all.

Mr. LAWRENCE. They are appointed under the laws of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. They are only a commission to investigate and report information to the House which the House itself has not time to procure.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Can we provide by law for the appointment of commissioners of claims to examine claims, for instance in the Southern States? Is the appointment of such officers as that vested in the House of Representatives?

Mr. HOLMAN. This will be in the nature of a joint committee appointed by the two branches of the Legislature. These will not be officers, but commissioners for the purpose of taking testimony on which Congress shall act.

Mr. LAWRENCE. But they are commissioners so far when clothed with the duties imposed upon them by this bill. I am not antagonizing the bill, but it is better to relieve ourselves of any constitutional objection, if there be any, and it seems to me that there is a difficulty. I would inquire if there are precedents for the appointment of such officers as these by the Speaker of the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it not the Senate who appointed the Congressional Printer?

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, yes; he is an officer of the Senate, and the Senate and House may each appoint its own officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was a mere evasion. In fact, he is an officer of the United States in some sense, although in another respect he is simply an agent of the two Houses, although appointed by the Senate. He discharges functions which belong in fact to the House and Senate which appertain to their legislative powers while here. These proposed commissioners are not in any proper sense officers, because they are commissioners simply to furnish data on which Congress shall legislate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Still the duties with which they are clothed make them officers.

Mr. HENKLE. I am not a lawyer and do not profess to be conversant with these technical niceties at all, but I think the duties imposed upon these commissioners hardly amount to the dignity of official duties. They are appointed by the two Houses simply for the purpose of collecting information which the two Houses are not in possession of and report it to the Houses. They are truly authorized to summon witnesses and to administer oaths, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to enforce their investigations in a satisfactory manner. That is necessary in order to carry out the investigation; but they are simply and only appointed to gather information which the House has not possession of, to enable the two Houses to legislate intelligently on this question.

The Committe for the District of Columbia has considered the subject thoroughly and carefully. This bill is an important one, and the ends of justice demand that something shall be done for the many persons in this District who are in needy circumstances. I call for the previous question on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. HENKLE. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is, whether these commissioners are required to report to Congress the testimony taken by them?

Mr. HENKLE. They are required to report to Congress all the evidence and everything pertaining to the investigation.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN MARYLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 3012) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The preamble of the bill states that it is represented to this present Congress that the Southern Maryland Railroad Company, organized under the provisions of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland entitled "An act to incorporate the Southern Maryland Railroad Company," approved March 20, 1868, desire to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, authorizes the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia, to a point on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River between the Anacostia Bridge and Benning's Bridge, over the said Eastern Branch of the said Potomac River, to form a convenient junction with the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad within the District of Columbia, as may be determined on by said companies; to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and be subject to the same restrictions, in the extension, construction, and operation of their said railroad into and within the said District, as are extended to like corporations under the existing laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDEE. This bill does not allow this road to come on this side of the East Branch, as it is called. It allows it only to make connection with the Baltimore and Ohio and Baltimore and Potomac Railroads on such terms as may be agreed upon by the companies. The road is now being built from Point Lookout, at the confluence of Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac River, to this city and to the city of Baltimore. It is simply for the convenience of the public that these connections are allowed to be made.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was according read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering House bill No. 3411, authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. HENDEE. I hope the gentleman will include in his motion the bill reported by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CATE] today and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the District of Columbia business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not rather late to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill? It is a very important measure, and it is now after four o'clock.

Mr. BUCKNER. I know it is rather late; but if Congress proposes to do anything in reference to the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, it is important that we should act as early as possible. The Committee for the District of Columbia will not be entitled to another day for their business for a month unless by special assignment. I would prefer that the House should act on this bill now, and either pass it or reject it.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BUCKNER; and upon a division there were—ayes 86, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 55, noes 81.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SPRINGER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. PIPER were appointed.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am not disposed to press this matter now, but I would ask unanimous consent that this bill be assigned for consideration next Friday evening at half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now dividing on the motion to adjourn.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 55, noes 61.

Pending the announcement of the result of this vote,

Mr. HENDEE said: I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. At the time the motion to adjourn was made the bill under consideration had been partly read by the Clerk. If the House should now adjourn, will it come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule on that question to-morrow after consulting the rules.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF CERTAIN INDIANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting sketches illustrating the manners and customs of certain Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AFFAIRS AT FORT SILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of an article from the New York Times relative to matters at Fort Sill; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF VETERANS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report by the Quartermaster-General on the application of the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War for loan of tents; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CLAIMS UPON VENEZUELA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 10th instant, a report and accompanying papers from the Secretary of State in relation to the course pursued to enforce the provisions of the convention with Venezuela of April 25, 1866, and the payment of adjudicated claims under the act approved February 25, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LUTTRELL for a few days on account of sickness; to Mr. WHEELER indefinitely from May 15; to Mr. HURLBUT for fourteen days on account of important business; to Mr. ANDERSON for four days on account of important business, and to Mr. NEAL for one week.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DENNIS presented a petition of citizens of Maryland, praying that the internal-revenue tax on home-made brandies be so modified as to exempt entirely from the tax a certain quantity for home consumption or reduce it one-half on the whole quantity made; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN presented a memorial of medical gentlemen of Zanesville, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to incorporate the national surgical institute of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Allexey W. von Schmidt, of San Francisco, California, who recites that he is the author of an invention which is patented for removing obstructions to navigation, and that his method is being infringed upon by the Government of the United States at Hell Gate, Willett's Point, and other places. He states that if this infringement were by a private citizen he would have a remedy at law, but as it is by the Government of the United States he has none, and he therefore asks leave to bring suit in the Court of Claims. As the petition relates to operations being carried on by the Engineer Corps, perhaps it would be better that it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not have it go to the Committee on Patents?

Mr. SARGENT. It is not a question of the extension of a patent, or anything that ordinarily comes within the province of that committee, as I understand it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a question of infringement, the petitioner says.

Mr. SARGENT. The evidence whether it is an infringement or not perhaps will be best shown in the Court of Claims. If the Committee on Military Affairs, on consultation with the War Department, are satisfied that there is a collision between the rights of this party and the action of the Government, I suppose they would authorize a suit of that kind. As they are in communication with the War Department in ordinary business, perhaps they would have more facility for investigating the case. I am not particular, however, about the reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, but suggest that committee on account of the intimate relation between it and the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly that would be very convenient; but, on the same principle of the relation of committees, if an Indian agent were infringed in the use of his patent by the Government his claim of infringement would have to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I think the essential reason of the thing is that if it be a matter which grows out of a patent-right and a claim upon the Government in respect of the Government infringing the use of the patent, the Committee on Patents is the proper committee, because they are supposed to be able to understand better than the rest of us on a cursory examination whether there is any prima facie ground for the claim.

Mr. SARGENT. I am very well satisfied with the Senator's reasoning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course the Senator sees the point of my objection to the petition going to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt the Committee on Patents will act fairly, and I am satisfied with the reference suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Patents, if there be no objection.

Mr. WHYTE presented the memorial of Alexander Brown & Sons, C. Morton Stewart & Co., and other merchants of Baltimore, in relation to the distribution of the balance of the Geneva award and in favor of the passage of the bill providing for the payment of war premiums, hulls, and cargoes; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOOTH presented a resolution of the Legislature of California and a petition of the State officers of California and 700 others, praying immediate legislation on the part of Congress to quiet the title to certain school lands donated by Congress to the State of California; which were ordered to lie on the table, as he was about to report a bill on the subject.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 270) relating to pre-emption claims, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 351) to create an additional land office at Colfax, in Whitman County, Washington Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 149) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The purpose of the bill is to enable creditors to proceed against the stockholders of a banking association upon the failure of the receiver or comptroller to answer the complaint of the creditors. This matter has been already provided for by amendments reported from the committee to a House bill, so that this bill is not necessary.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 456) to reduce the interest upon the public debt; provide for a safe and elastic currency; for the speedy appreciation of the value of Treasury notes and national-bank notes to that of coin; and to guard against panics and inflation of bank credits, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 686) to amend the second, fourth, and fifth sections of the act entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870, and as a substitute for sections 5506 and 5507 of the Revised Statutes, to report it with amendments. This is the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to endeavor to bring the statutes of the United States up to a "concert pitch" with the decisions of the Supreme Court on the subject of civil rights and the right of suffrage. The committee have carefully considered it and have made such amendments as they thought were desirable. I wish to give notice that at the earliest opportunity, which I shall endeavor to find very soon, we shall ask to have the bill taken up and disposed of.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2826) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons, reported it without amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1947) granting to the city of Stevens Point, Wisconsin, a certain piece of land, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2110) for the restoration to market of certain lands in the Territory of Utah, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the board of county commissioners of Saline County, Kansas, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred two petitions of citizens of Emmett County, Michigan, praying for an amendment of a law in relation to public lands in that State and in favor of extending the time for actual settlers to make homestead entry for one year from March 3, 1876, asked to discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. If it will meet the favor of the Senate I would be very glad if the Senate would take up and pass—for I think there will be no debate about it—House bill No. 3136, reported from the Committee on Public Lands yesterday, extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made. The reason why I ask its present consideration is this: There are one or two townships in Michigan where certain tribes of Indians were to have title and be settled under some legislation to be had subsequently. That legislation has all been had, and the title those Indians have to the land has been settled. Patents have been issued to them in regard to those lands. There are certain valuable pine lands in the same townships, timber lands valuable for the pine upon them. That pine land was reserved for the public by the act. There are also in the township other lands not pine lands, not mineral lands, and not Indian lands; simply public lands. The act, which passed a year ago, held that land for occupancy by homestead settlers open for one year. That year expired in March last. Sixty days from that time it will be open again to entry by purchasers. The committee thought that as it was simply public land, and not the township's land, and free from any objection in the world, it should be open to homestead settlement. This bill simply provides that the homesteaders may settle upon it and get the benefit of it, as they do in every other State and Territory in the Union. The sixty days will very soon expire. The bill has passed the House, is now in the Senate, and, if there be no objection to it, it will pass in a minute or two, and then the homestead settlers may take about 10,000 acres of land left yet for that purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands whether the bill will probably lead to debate?

Mr. OGLESBY. Not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. If not, I have no objection to its present consideration; but, if it is to lead to debate, I must object.

Mr. OGLESBY. The explanation I have made about it is all there is of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks the present consideration of the bill he has named. Is there objection?

Mr. OGLESBY. I am under the impression that another matter, perhaps of rather more pressing importance than this bill, will be worthy of the attention of the Senate; and that that subject may receive due and prompt attention I yield the floor to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and withhold my motion to take up the bill until to-morrow morning.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 129) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the views of the minority upon the bill, which I ask may be printed with the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 805) relating to indemnity school selections in the State of California, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of Lewis Goodwin, and the bill (S. No. 103) for the relief of Lewis Goodwin, late keeper of the light-vessel at Brant Island Shoal, in the State of North Carolina, to report adversely upon them. At the request of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] I ask that the House bill go upon the Calendar, but that the Senate bill be rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee and the Senate bill will be rejected, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 832) to increase the pension of Helen M. Stansbury; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 833) granting a pension to Johanna Luskey; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 834) to restore to the pension-roll the names of Bridget Ahern and Catharine Maloney; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 835) for the relief of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 836) for the relief of Alexander Repine; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 837) to provide for a reduction of the area of the Nez Percé and Fort Hall Indian reservations, in the Territory of Idaho; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENNIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 838) for the relief of William C. Spencer; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I desired to-day to submit a few observations on the general subject of Chinese immigration; and if it is the pleasure of the Senate that I shall proceed now I shall feel under many obligations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand that to be a desire on the part of the Senator to proceed beyond half past twelve o'clock?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like, if it be the pleasure of the Senate, to have the time extended until I shall have finished what I desire to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly have no objection as an accommodation to the Senator, if there is unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. How long does the Senator desire to speak?

Mr. MITCHELL. Half an hour or three-quarters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the bill of the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] presented by him yesterday, not having been printed, I have not had an opportunity, of course, to examine its provisions. I have, however, a general knowledge, I think, of their import. I move, therefore, to take up the resolution introduced by the Senator from California a few days ago, having reference to the reformation of the treaty with China.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to take the resolution offered by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] from the table. The Chair hears no objection, and the following resolution is before the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate recommends to the President that he cause negotiations to be entered upon with the Chinese government to effect such change in the existing treaty between the United States and China as will lawfully permit the application of restrictions upon the great influx of Chinese subjects to this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was about to say that not having had an opportunity to examine into the provisions of the bill introduced by the Senator from California yesterday, I desire more especially to speak to the resolution now before the Senate.

The importance of the questions involved in the pending resolution and the magnitude of the evil sought to be remedied have induced me to vary from my more usual course of keeping silence in this Chamber. Nor would I now depart from my customary course were it not for the fact that the Pacific States and Territories are, more than any portion of our country, the theater upon which this new evil, dangerous, threatening, imminent as it is, as I believe, to our moral, social, and political structure, is exhibited in all its loathsome features and degrading tendencies. Perhaps, Mr. President, no question of graver import could be presented to the consideration of the American Senate than that involved in the general subject of Chinese immigration and the results it must necessarily have upon our civilization. It is a question, to my mind, that the Congress of the nation cannot evade if it would, and one that it cannot afford to ignore if, by any possibility, it could.

The evil, Mr. President, which this sudden and alarming influx of the Mongolian race is casting upon our common country is one which to my mind, which to the minds of the people of the Pacific coast, menaces to-day the stability and purity of our moral peace, the integrity of our social and political structure, and jeopardizes and disturbs the civilization of our age. And, sir, as the offal of the slaughter-house and the putrescence of the cess-pool will the more readily and the more completely impart impurity and general pollution to the small stream near the mountain-side than to the deep, broad river nearer to the sea, so will communities that are new, sparse in numbers, weak comparatively by reason of their infancy, like those of the Pacific States and Territories, be more likely to be trampled down, corrupted, and defiled by this species of immigration than will be those communities that are older and more firmly established, like those that exist on the Atlantic coast.

Standing, therefore, in their infancy, comparatively, as do the people of the North Pacific coast, face to face with a population of over four hundred million people, in the very gateway, if you please, of the Chinese empire, of a people the dregs and the debased of whom are by the thousands upon thousands to-day flooding our country, is it at all strange that this people should appeal to the Congress of the nation in terms of more than ordinary earnestness for some measure of relief against this great evil?

It would be useless for me, after the very able argument of the honorable Senator from California, in which he elaborated truthfully the evils of Chinese immigration upon the Pacific coast, to detain the Senate for any great length of time in any attempts on my part to add, or attempt to add, either to the verity or the loathsome character of the picture so truthfully and so vividly drawn by him. He has stripped of its bandages this festering sore which, like a plague-spot, has fastened itself upon the very vitals of our western civilization and which to-day threatens to destroy it. And, Mr. President, almost at the expense on his part of a violation of the conventionalities of speech in reference to delicacy in the use of terms in this presence, he has presented this sore to the gaze of the Senate, the country, and the world, in all its sickening putrefaction and contaminating touch. He has arrayed before you witnesses from the courts, from the prisons, from the almshouses, from boards of trade, from chambers of commerce, from city, county, and State authorities, and from private citizens as well, whose concurrent testimony establishes beyond the possibility of successful contradiction the alarming facts, that the effect of Chinese immigration upon the Pacific coast is to degrade the industry of the country, to subordinate the labor of the honest, hard-working, free American citizen to that of the dishonest, servile legions of a rice-eating and heathen race; to establish within our borders a system of serfdom equal to, and, I think I may say with safety, infinitely worse in some respects, than any that has ever heretofore cursed our country with its iniquity; to debauch and defile our youth; to corrupt the channels of trade; to set upon the face of our beautiful cities the degrading seal, the disgusting impress of Asiatic life and manners; in a word, to contaminate and blast our civilization with the degrading tendencies of a people numbering nearly, if not altogether, one-half the entire population of the globe; a people whose history, customs, habits, modes of life, and aspirations have for ages, and must of necessity continue to be for centuries yet to come, surrounded in the shades and consequent darkness of heathenism.

O, but says one, even admitting our physical power to inhibit this class of immigration to our country, yet upon the broad principles of humanitarianism, on the doctrine of the right of expatriation, our doors should not be closed. No, say they, not even against the criminal heathen of the nations; but, on the contrary, this asylum of ours, of which we are all so proud to speak, and the more especially in this centennial year, should, like the gates of gospel grace, stand forever open night and day to all people, of all lands and creeds and tongues and customs and habits and dispositions and aspirations, and of all virtues and vices as well.

This, Mr. President, is all very fine, and in sentiment and theory may be all very well; and I concede, as a general rule, with exceptions perhaps as to criminals and paupers, it may with safety to our institutions be applied to the Christian nations of the world. But it does seem to me that the people of America, the people of the United States, should have some regard for themselves, and while they are willing that the light of our civilization should be diffused among the millions, that the humanizing and Christianizing influences of our institutions should be extended to all lands and among all peoples, yet at the same time we do absolutely owe something to ourselves; and the question here presents itself whether our civilization, pure, ennobling, strong, powerful, and good as it is to-day, can afford to stand the corruptions and the deadly vices that must necessarily result to it from flooding our land with a nation of criminal, debased, and debasing slaves; whether we can afford that our land should be overrun and our institutions permeated with the influence of a pagan people, uneducated, as a rule, save in the worst vices of a dark age, a people schooled in a forum presided over by neither God nor conscience, guided and controlled in their course of conduct only by the gratification of their lusts, restrained solely by a cruel superstition, which in most cases transforms the most infamous crimes into the fancied virtues of their race, such as the abandonment of their young, their sick, their aged, their decrepit, their dying, to the tender mercies of the elements; a people that never have been and never can become attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, nor be well disposed toward the peace and good order of our country; a people whose religion is pagan, and whose god an idol, whose element of warfare against decent, respectable society is that irrepressible stench that inevitably arises from the dens and caverns in which they in our cities do congregate more like unreasoning beasts than reasoning men. The question is whether we can afford to submit our civilization and our institutions to all the untold horrors that must necessarily result to us and our posterity, to the peace, the good order, the general welfare, the tranquillity of our country, by planting in our midst a people such as this? Can we afford, in justice to the poor, hard-working, toiling millions of the land, men and women, who earn for themselves and their families their daily bread by the sweat of their faces, to see their means of subsistence filched from them by a species of serfdom, by a slavery, if you please, the very counterpart of which, in years not long gone by, evolved an issue in this country which drenched our land in blood?

The question presented, Mr. President, is not an old one. As stated in an article recently published in the New York Nation, and referred to by the honorable Senator from California in his speech the other day—is the only American community and, in fact, the only western community from the beginning of history which has had any experience of the actual effect of a Chinese immigration. The immigration from which we in the Eastern States are obliged to draw all our inferences as to the probable effect of such an experiment has been from countries which are allied to our own by race, language, religion, or customs; and the few Chinese whose acquaintance we have made have been chiefly objects of curiosity to us. To California they have come in numbers, and, speaking a different language, worshiping unknown gods, keeping alive imported customs and traditions, they form almost a separate caste. Now such a state of affairs is, under our system of government, very difficult to deal with. In mediæval times it would have been simple enough, because laws and customs would have arisen based on the inferiority of one race and the superiority of the other.

California—

And the editor might have added the whole Pacific coast—

The question then, Mr. President, is a new one, and it is as difficult, complicated, and intricate as it is new. It is not a question as to obligation, or duty, or power with reference to our attitude toward or our dealing with those inferior races and classes of people which from time immemorial, from the earliest period of our country's history, have formed a part and parcel of our population. From those, under the judicious management and guidance of our Government and our people, our civilization has nothing to fear; while in fact the attitude of our Government in that direction in years but recently passed has brought new stars to the crown of our civilization. The question of dealing with those born on our own soil, and with those who from the Christian nations of the world seek an asylum, a home here, is one thing; while throwing wide our doors to the vassals, the criminals, the lepers, and the debased of the Asiatic countries of the world is quite another and a very different thing. And the very fact that a large part of our population, of those who shape and control its legislation, State and Federal, once bore allegiance to some of the Christian European powers, tends to a feeling of international unity and adds to our peace, our commercial and political prosperity among the nations of the world.

Since the beginning of our history no such question has been forced upon us; and can we, upon the ground of humanity, upon any principle of world-wide patriotism, on the doctrine of the right of expatriation, on the principles of the Christian religion, upon any of these or upon all of these combined, afford to have our land deluged by the dregs of the Mongolian race? A race which, according to the well-selected language of the "Nation" to which I have attracted attention, "speak a different language, worship unknown gods, keep alive imported customs and traditions, and form almost a separate caste."

I know that their influx into this country will widen the field of the missionary within our own bounds. I know that so long as they are permitted to come some of their number, but the very fewest, will be lifted from the depths of their degradation, and through the commendable efforts of Christian men and Christian women be placed upon the higher and broader and better plane of American civilization and of Christianity. But will even this, either in a moral or Christian point of view, compensate for the pestilence, the moral, social, political pestilence with which the countless thousands that will come, and who are necessarily unreclaimed, will infect the present and future generations of our people? I am not unmindful of the value of an influence that will result in lifting even one soul from the depths of heathenism; but, much as that influence is to be valued, it is no more to be prized than is to be deplored that other influence which will result in leading even a solitary American youth away from the traditions of his fathers and the influence of his country down to the doors of moral death and to a grave of infamy and disgrace.

But, Mr. President, it is said there is no danger, after all; but few will come, and there is no reason for alarm. Let me say that in my judgment the man who believes this, the statesman who acts upon this to-day, will be like certain men we read of who believe a lie and are damned. Asia can spare fifty million and scarcely miss them from her shores, and they are coming. Already the tide of immigration has set in across the waters of the Pacific, and to-day they are coming by the thousand into the ports of California and Oregon and Washington Territory, and all the other ports of the Pacific coast, bringing with them—what? Intelligence, wealth, virtue? Not much, but rather ignorance, and poverty, and crime, pestilence, moral, social, political, in their most alarming and dreaded forms.

A reference to a few arrivals of steamers recently on the Pacific coast will give some idea in regard to the alarming character of this immigration at the present time. In a dispatch from San Francisco, April 16, I read:

The British steamer Crocus arrived to-day from Hong-Kong via Yokohama, with rice and eight hundred and eighty-two Chinamen. She reports two other British steamers there up for this port.

Three days after we have another dispatch dated April 19, 1876, which says:

The Pacific Mail steamship Great Republic arrived in this port from China yesterday morning after a smooth passage of twenty-four days. She had on board one thousand and seventy-five Chinese, having lost one through suicide. The Great Republic reports the Belgic to follow with about six hundred Chinese. She also reports leaving the Quang Se ready for a shipment of coolies. The officers of the Great Republic say that all steamers from China for the next four months will be crowded with coolies.

So we see that in a short space of three days we have two thousand one hundred and fifty-seven Chinese arriving in the port of San Francisco alone, and it is a matter of history that for the past number of months and to-day they are arriving in San Francisco alone at the rate of from a thousand to twelve hundred per week; from four to five thousand per month; at the rate of sixty thousand a year. The man who imagines that this flood will not increase in volume and in power so long as our gates are open, until we have an imperium in imperio, an Asiatic government within our own founded upon the worst elements of human depravity, mistakes in my judgment the signs of the times, and fails to correctly trace the inevitable logic of events.

But, sir, what is the remedy for this evil? Is there any remedy, I ask, that can be applied with complete effect to this great, this new evil short of that of absolute prohibition of the Chinese immigration? I believe that there is not; and, until this is done, all the efforts that may be devised by the brains of the wisest statesmen intended to regulate this species of immigration will stand a dead letter on the statute-book. A law which cannot be enforced by reason of the peculiar circumstances surrounding its violation is as no law at all; and in the mean time the evil intended to be interdicted goes on with giant strides, boldly and defiantly. And such, let me say to the Senate, is the present condition of our congressional legislation on the subject of prohibiting the importation of coolies and of women for immoral practices. Why, sir, the whole of the present Chinese population of our country, with the exception of a mere fraction, is composed of these two classes; and therefore, to this very large extent, is the present immigration from China in direct violation of law. But, notwithstanding this, on account of the unrestrained fraud, the black perjury, the subtle chicanery, the dark-eyed conspiracy peculiar to this class of people, and for which those who engage in this nefarious business are notorious, conviction is simply impossible. The remedy, therefore, in my judgment, that is, the complete remedy, is in a large limitation upon, or an absolute abrogation of, the right of the Chinese subject both to expatriation and immigration, in so far as our country is concerned.

But here we are met with the objection again that this is a favored doctrine of our Government, and especially with the present Administration and the republican party, and that it was incorporated in terms by this Administration in the Burlingame treaty. This is all very true, and, as a general rule, I contend that the doctrine of the right of the subject of any civilized European country to abjure his allegiance to his own government and better his political fortunes by attaching them to another government is one that ought to be upheld by the civilized world, one that should receive the approbation of mankind; and especially should intelligent, free America extend this doctrine to the civilized governments of Europe, and not only extend it to them but insist upon it with reference to all such governments whose subjects—either in large or small numbers—may desire to better their political condition by seeking a home and asylum in our country, by becoming citizens of our Republic, and thus availing themselves of the superior immunities from political oppression afforded by our peculiar form of government.

But, Mr. President, there are nations, in my judgment, that are exceptions to this rule, and if they do come technically within the rule, as no possible good can come to the subject, nor to our own country, but on the contrary an infinitude of harm, then I contend they should mark the exception, and thus add stability and force and power and strength to the rule itself.

Let us look at this rule for a moment and at the exception, because I claim that there is an exception, and that it is in this case. We go down then into the depths of Asia, among the Chinese of China, if you please; we look upon that strange people, the history of whose imperialism runs back into the ages, yes, even so far back that the penetrating eye of the nineteenth century fails to trace its origin in the shades of departed time; and we ask of them, "Do you desire a change in your government?" and they answer, "No." We then say to them, "Do you, as individuals, desire to better your political condition; do you desire to abjure your allegiance to imperial power: do you desire to attach your allegiance to our institutions, to our country; do you desire to become citizens and sovereigns in America?" and they again answer, "No!" emphatically, "No!" They will say to you in their broken tongue, "Me no likee Melican man; me no sabe Melican Government." And then we go to the better classes of the people of that country, and say to them—I refer now to men engaged in commerce, in agriculture, in manufactures, we go to the merchant, the manufacturer, the artisan, and the professional man, to the better classes, if you please, of China and of Asia generally—and we say to them, "Do you desire to change your domicile across the water? Do you desire to establish yourselves firmly in business in America, there to better, if you please, your political and your personal condition, there to add intelligence, wealth, and power to our institutions and government, there to live and there to die?" and you will be again met in nine cases out of ten with a negative answer. But there is another class—I refer to men who traffic in human flesh and female virtue; who subsist on the fruits of crime; whose history, from its birth, is marked with treason against morality, and peace, and law, and order, and good government, and these, and these alone, are the men of the empire who have their eyes on America, and through their influence and their machinations our shores on the Pacific coast—you may not feel it here, but our shores, the golden shores of the Pacific are to-day being flooded with the serfs, the criminals, the mendicants, the opium-eating gamblers, the leprous prostitutes, the most debased, in every sense of the word, of the Chinese Empire.

To permit this, when no possible good can come to the Chinese subject, as I have already shown, and when, instead of adding to the intelligence, the wealth, the prosperity, the dignity of our country, it but brings poverty, and disease, and pestilence, and crime, simply out of a desire on our part to adhere to a principle, is, to my mind, to subordinate the truest and best interests of this Government, the general welfare, and the domestic tranquillity, to the vindication of a mere idea in political ethics. It is one, in my judgment, that cannot be sustained for one solitary moment by any element of true statesmanship; and, sir, if it is persisted in, I predict here and now that the people of the next centennial, if not of the next generation, will eat of its bitter fruits and drink of its poisoned waters.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask whether any portion of the Chinese on our western shores are naturalized; and, if so, do they belong to the voting population of California and Oregon?

Mr. MITCHELL. They are not naturalized; and not only that, but they do not desire to be naturalized; and that is the very point I have been trying to make, that the country from which they come is an exception to the nations of the world to which the doctrine of the right of expatriation ought to be extended by our country.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose they are content to be naturalized and our people are content that they shall be and become voters among them?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is simply supposing a case that never will occur, as I have been endeavoring to show. I have been endeavoring to show that all their inclinations and aspirations and dispositions are in the other direction. They do not desire either a change of government in their own country or a transfer of their allegiance to this.

Mr. SARGENT. If my friend will allow me, I will say that the people of the Pacific coast do not wish them to be naturalized. Naturalization would only add to the mischiefs. Put the ballot in the hands of the sixty thousand Chinese in California, and they would be marshalled in squads at the polls by their masters, the six companies, with ballots prepared beforehand and dictated to them, and the influence of white men in the government of California would soon cease to exist. California would be a mere Asiatic province.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is unquestionably true, and the same thing applies in relation to the State of Oregon. The whole immigration is not a voluntary one; it is controlled, as stated by the Senator from California, by these six companies, by these masters, if you please, in whose control and under whose subjection is every Chinese, male and female, that comes from the empire to our shores; and, as stated, the ballot in their hands would but add to the horrors of the situation.

But, Mr. President, can the Congress of the nation, in the face of the Burlingame treaty, provide a remedy constitutionally or consistently equal to the magnitude of this great evil? Perhaps they can. Perhaps they may upon the ground that, I understand, has been decided more than once by the Supreme Court of the United States, to the effect that, although a treaty is the supreme law of the land yet an act of Congress passed subsequently to the date when the treaty went into operation will, so far as it conflicts with the provisions of the treaty, abrogate it or suspend its functions. Whatever may be our power in this respect—and I concede that, if we have the power, it is one that should be approached with care and with great caution—it is certain that we have the power to appeal to the Executive of the nation, and ask of him and of our Secretary of State to enter into negotiations with the Chinese government looking to a reformation of the treaty; and this, in my judgment, after all, is the real remedy that ought to be applied in this case.

While I have said that I would approach with extreme caution any legislation by Congress upon this subject that would come in conflict with any existing treaty stipulation, still I will say that, if it is apparent to the country that the civilization of our land is in jeopardy, that our institutions are in imminent danger from this species of immigration, and you cannot reach it in any other way, then I would apply the remedy, desperate as it is, although it shake the empire to its foundations.

I hope then, Mr. President, to see the pending resolution adopted by this honorable body, and adopted at an early day. It is demanded by every consideration of humanity; it is demanded as a matter of justice to the poor, toiling, hard-working men and women of the Pacific coast who by the wages resulting from their daily toil, which at best is but meager, support themselves and their families, and whose labor to-day is being brought into direct and dangerous competition with the labor of Chinese serfs, whose food and raiment and other necessaries cost, under their peculiar modes of life, but little or nothing. Without families to support, their masters can afford to work them at rates far below those that are absolutely necessary to maintain one of our own citizens alone, to say nothing of his family.

But, Mr. President, it is demanded also by the merchant and the manufacturer, who in many instances on our coast are unable to compete in their productions with prices regulated by cooly labor, and who are, therefore, necessarily compelled to close their stores and shut up their shops. But, above all, it is demanded by the highest considerations of justice and right that can possibly attach to the American name or direct the destiny of the American people.

And here, Mr. President, let me read for a moment—and I will detain the Senate but a very few minutes longer—a dispatch of May 1 from Antioch, California, which reads as follows:

ANTIOCH, CALIFORNIA, May 1.

A fire occurred here which was the culmination of an excitement that has been growing since last Saturday, when one of the doctors informed various parties that several boys had visited a Chinese house of prostitution on the outskirts of the town and were now, in consequence, under his treatment. In a short time their parents heard of it and extreme measures were talked of, but better counsel prevailed. On Saturday morning thirty-five or forty citizens proceeded to the Chinese dens and notified them to leave town before three o'clock, or trouble would ensue. This all promised to do, and several of them started up the river in a sail-boat for Stockton and others taking the steamer for San Francisco. Among the latter was one woman who was nearly gone with disease. A boss Chinaman was sent with them, but much against his will, it requiring the efforts of two men to get him on the boat. It being supposed that the women had left for good, the excitement subsided. However, on Sunday afternoon, it was reported that the women who had started for Stockton had returned, which revived the excitement of Saturday, but nothing occurred to disturb the serenity of the Sabbath until about eight p. m., when a cry of fire was raised, and it was soon apparent that action had been taken. Chinatown was on fire, and a crowd of curious lookers-on assembled, together with the fire company, but little was done to stay the progress of the fire, and all but two of the buildings were destroyed—the inmates fleeing terror-stricken. How the fire was started, no one knows. To-day the remaining buildings have been removed, and Antioch is now free from this degraded class.

Again, a San Francisco dispatch to the eastern papers says:

SAN FRANCISCO, May 3, 1876.

The South San Francisco Anti-Cooly Club and the Young Men's Universal Reform Society held meetings last night and passed resolutions indorsing the destruction of the Chinese quarters in the town of Antioch, and advocating a similar course in this city unless the Federal Government should take immediate steps to abate the evil of Chinese immigration. Highly incendiary speeches were made and letters read from societies in the interior of the State seeking the co-operation of San Francisco anti-cooly organizations. The sergeant-at-arms of the Young Men's Universal Reform Society announced that he had received a telegram from New York saying that twenty-six hundred stand of arms could be delivered here at ten days' notice.

While such talk and action are universally reprobated by the great mass of thinking people in this city, there can be no doubt that it meets the approval of a large and dangerous class in the community, and that, in the event of no action being taken in the matter by the General Government, there is grave reason to fear serious disturbances here at no distant day.

Now then, Mr. President, while that spirit of mobocracy which sometimes invades the domain of law and order should be condemned by all good citizens at all times and under all circumstances and at all places, still when these things do occur, whether from real or imaginary causes, I contend, as did the Senator from California the other day, that it is the duty, the bounden duty of the Government to inquire into the cause of discontent, and if it is found that any real cause exists, then to apply the remedy by abating the cause.

The sentiment of the people of the Pacific coast is, universally I may say, opposed to further Chinese immigration. This is the view of everybody, of all political parties. It is not a party question. But while this is so, they, as a rule, are a law-abiding people, and they recognize the fact that the Chinese that are absolutely here are here in virtue of treaty stipulation; that they, therefore, are rightfully here; and that being here, they are in all their civil rights entitled to the equal protection of the law. If there are any others—and I must confess there are a few on our Pacific coast—who do not recognize these facts, and who counsel a resort to violence, they do but paralyze the arms of the real reformer at home, in the East, throughout the country, in the councils of the nation, and everywhere else. They trample upon law and order. They excite to anarchy and confusion. They fan the flame of prejudice and discord; and so far from removing the cause of the discontent by such a course of action, they do but rear formidable impediments in the only legitimate way in which the evil can be corrected.

I then, Mr. President, in conclusion appeal to the Senate; I join my friend from California in behalf of the people of the Pacific coast in appealing to the Senate, and the Congress, and the President, and the Secretary of State, and to the whole people, to all men and all women everywhere throughout this land who love their country, who have a pride in its progress, in its civilization, and a high hope for its future destiny, to come now to the rescue and crush out in its infancy this viper that, if permitted to live and grow, will at last and at no distant future gnaw with deadening effect at the very vitals of the civilization of this country.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill (S. No. 829) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States, which I introduced yesterday, be now ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce, allowing this resolution to lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made. The resolution will lie on the table.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. CONKLING. Not without the consent of the Senator from California, I suggest that the bill just referred to the Committee on Commerce more appropriately belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I move therefore that the reference be changed, the Senator from California having no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should have some question about that. I think that this matter, in accordance with the views expressed by the Supreme Court and in accordance with the Constitution, belongs to the subject of commerce, and that whatever regulations are to be made upon the subject must be made as regulations of commerce. I do not know the precise phraseology of the bill, exactly what it purports to do.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill in effect limits the number of Chinese who may be imported in any one year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is purely a regulation of commerce, and I submit to my honorable friend from New York that the committee of which he is the chairman is the appropriate committee to consider a question of that kind.

Mr. CONKLING. I made a mistake in not consulting my honorable friend from Vermont, instead of consulting the mover of this bill, in order to get consent to move in the Senate that it should take what seems to me its appropriate reference. Doubtless, if I had made to the Senator from Vermont the suggestions which I think I could make now to the Senate, he would have seen some reasons which are not covered by the remarks he has made; but speaking to the Senator who moved the bill, and finding that he concurred with me, I made the suggestion at once. Without going into the reasons generally, I will assign one.

The proceeding against which this bill is aimed is of course more or less in consequence of, if not by virtue of, a treaty, as all those who have listened to the very interesting and able speech made by the Senator from Oregon have perceived, if their attention has not been drawn to that before. In dealing with that subject, certainly it seems to me, the considerations involved are those appropriate to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have no personal objection myself—and if I had it would be counterbalanced—to considering this bill, because it so chances that I am a member of each of these committees. It is not therefore in my own behalf in any sense that I make this suggestion; but it seems to me very clear that a measure which is to execute, to coincide with, or to impinge upon an existing treaty, ought appropriately to be considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations and not by the Committee on Commerce, although in some general sense or relation the bill may be commercial in its effect. Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and anything that regulates commerce merely is appropriately referred to the committee having charge of such topics; but every Senator must see that a provision restricting emigration from a foreign land which emigration proceeds largely in consequence of a treaty made with that country, is a great deal more than a matter concerning commercial relations.

But, as I said, I am not going to be tenacious about this matter, for it is not likely in any personal sense that it would make a difference to me whether it goes to one committee or to another committee, both of which I happen to be a member of. I have no doubt, however, that the appropriate reference of the bill would be to the committee which I suggested after finding that the mover of the bill had no objections to its going there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must express a profounder humiliation to my honorable friend from New York than he seems to feel, that I should have ventured to address myself to a question which was pending before the Senate without having first consulted him, and I offer all the apology that is possible under the circumstances. I am very sorry indeed that I did not know that I was offending the sensibilities of the distinguished Senator by proposing that a bill to regulate commerce, as it is understood under the Constitution and as it is settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court, should go to the committee of which he is the distinguished head. I shall hope that I shall so conduct my duties as Senator hereafter that I shall never do a thing of that kind again without first appealing to him either privately or publicly.

Having made this apology, I will, with what little strength I have left after such a painful procedure, proceed to say a word upon the topic. The honorable Senator from New York says that this has relation to a treaty. I should be glad to know upon what principle of international law it is that a statute which simply regulates the number of persons that on a particular voyage of a ship shall be brought into the United States has relation to any treaty of the United States that now exists or that is likely to exist. The treaty of the United States with China does not provide that there shall be unlimited passengers of the Chinese nation on any particular ship of the United States or any other state or country. It provides for free emigration from both countries, or rather for the free equal right of denizenship to the subjects and citizens of each country who happen to be in the other. That is the substance of the treaty; so that we have, the treaty notwithstanding, exactly the same power to regulate the number of passengers and the kinds of merchandise to be carried upon ships which are to be brought into our ports that we had without any treaty at all. That is purely and exclusively a regulation of commerce. So the Constitution seems to say and so repeated decisions of the Supreme Court have determined it to be. Therefore I do not think that I ought to be severely censured for suggesting that a measure of this kind, in the order of the business of the Senate, should go to the committee charged with subjects of that character, and not go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as if there was something in this bill that might be thought to invalidate or to overthrow the provisions of our treaty with the Chinese.

Mr. CONKLING. If at this moment I am not prepared to be facetious with the Senator from Vermont, I am willing to be frank; and therefore I will not be disingenuous enough to seem to display the impression made on me by the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. He found it convenient during his brief remarks to employ several times the terms "regulate" and "regulation." It seems to me that few words would naturally be more convenient to my honorable friend. I think a mission of his of late is to regulate, not so much commerce, as the Senate and his fellow-Senators.

Now, Mr. President, when a member of the Senate moves a bill in which he is deeply in earnest, so that no other member, however suspicious he may be, has the possibility of ground to doubt that it is a serious proceeding, and when he indicates a committee to which he is willing it shall go, and so indicates upon conference with a member of that committee, is it not true that it is somewhat unusual for any other member of the Senate to feel constrained, he being a member of neither committee, to interpose an objection, as if some serious reason existed why these two members of the Senate, (one the mover of the bill, and the other a member of each of the two committees to which it is proposed to refer it,) might not, as to the mere mode of proceeding, as to the mere detail of the treatment of the subject, arrange between themselves, without any other member of the Senate being moved for no reason except such as the honorable Senator from Vermont has suggested, to interpose and prevent it? The honorable Senator thinks, speaking his judgment, that it would be more appropriate that this bill should go to one committee of which he is not a member, rather than to another of which he is not a member. No member of either committee makes such a suggestion. As I have already said, the mover of the bill is agreed; the chairman of one of the committees proposed makes the suggestion, and nobody on either committee dissents.

Now, Mr. President, in all kindness to the Senator from Vermont and in all frankness also I submit to him that it is not a part of the obligation which rests upon him or any other Senator to be quite so alert, quite so careful in the supervision and government of the proceedings of the body and of others as this suggestion of his would indicate. I meant that frankly in my remarks; I do not disclaim it; and in order to show the Senator that I do it without any feeling ungracious toward him I say sincerely that I should have held myself guilty, if not of an affront, of something coming very near to that had our positions been reversed. Had the honorable Senator, being chairman of one of the leading committees of this body, of which it happens that I am a member, proposed that a bill which was to be sent to that committee by the formal motion made and which might appropriately go to another, of which he was also a member, should be sent to that other committee, and had the mover of the bill been entirely satisfied with that, I repeat that without some reason more cogent than the Senator from Vermont has suggested I should have thought that it was hardly courteous, hardly observant of that equality which exists in law and in fact between Senators and of that comity and regard by the members of the body for each other which makes it necessary for us to depend so little upon rules, for me to interpose at once with an objection without knowing whether convenience, some consideration having no public concern but perhaps being of some interest to some member of the body, might or might not exist. So it would have struck me, Mr. President; and yet I believe that among my many faults a chronic habit of objecting is not one. I hope no other member of this body has such a habit. I impute it to nobody; but had I made such an objection, I should have thought it signified on my part an ambition, a disposition at least, to seem to be somewhat pragmatic, somewhat more than careful in regulating the doings of the Senate and the disposition of its members. Therefore I was surprised at what the Senator from Vermont said. I made this suggestion originally, and I now adhere to it without the slightest feeling. If this bill is sent to the Committee on Commerce, as cheerfully as my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] who sits before me, who is a member of this committee, I shall address myself to it. I know of no reason in the world which will make me reluctant to address myself to this bill rather than to any other. Therefore I beg the Senate to understand that in that respect no imposition whatever will occur upon the Committee on Commerce should it be the pleasure of the Senate that the bill take that direction. But, on the other hand, it seemed to me a proper bill to go to the other committee. Not seeing the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the moment, I made the suggestion to the Senator from California. He acquiesced in it, and said on the whole he preferred to have the bill go to the Committee on Foreign Re'ations; and, as I did not say before, but which he will now permit me to say, it was upon his suggestion that I, rather than the Senator himself, made this motion. I did it indeed at his request, and therefore I was surprised when the honorable Senator from Vermont was not willing to allow even that little suggestion to pass without it being subjected to somewhat of regulation and supervision on his part.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senate will pardon me if I put in a second confession, because my honorable friend from New York has entirely vanquished me by what he has said now. He has stated that the ground of my suggestion must have been, as I understand it, that I am a chronic objector, and that I have interfered with what I ought not to have interfered with, and my good friend has said that he does not consider himself to be a chronic objector. I agree to that. I believe all the people of the United States know that "Barkis is willin';" there is no objection. I am quite sure also that if I could have had the benefit of knowing by some potent and invisible influence that the Senator from California, in private consultation with the Senator from New York, had desired that this bill should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should have made no suggestion about it. It is nothing to me.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I beg to remind him that I made my motion in these terms: "Not without the consent of the Senator from California, I suggest" so and so. I put the wish of the Senator from California in front of my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The RECORD will show what the Senator said; but if he said what he now thinks he said, I certainly did not hear it. If the Senator from New York had stated in my hearing that the Senator from California desired this bill to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should have said nothing about it, although my opinion (if I am allowed to have an opinion, as I believe I am by the Constitution, notwithstanding my friend from New York) would have been exactly the same. If there is any occult reason why the Senator from New York is shy of this question of Chinese immigration, and why his committee is shy of it, certainly I have not the slightest disposition to interfere. If the Committee on Foreign Relations is the better committee to regulate commerce in this particular instance, it is certainly nothing to me. Both committees are good ones, because, as my honorable friend from New York says, he is a member of both of them; therefore both committees will report the best possible bill, and it cannot be a bad one, because, as the honorable Senator from New York says, I am not a member of either of them. [Laughter.] So I am sure my good friend will give me the credit of not being particularly selfish or particularly proud (except in the sense of being generally unwilling, in which respect I am entirely different from him, if common report is true) in having spoken about this matter at all.

But so much, Mr. President, for the humor of the thing. I repeat what I believe I have already said, that if the Senator from California desires this measure of his to be considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations rather than the Committee on Commerce, I have no suggestion to make; but I did not know that before. Very likely it was my own fault. If he states so now, I have not a word to say.

Mr. SARGENT. It is only fair to the Senator from New York that I should state that he consulted with me in reference to the matter, and that I said I should like to have the bill go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from California state whether I am right or not in my recollection that I so stated to the Senate in substance?

Mr. SARGENT. My recollection concurs with that of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 2982) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Joint Stock Company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 3012) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. No. 3464) for the relief of Ella Long was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERMENTS IN CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 679) relative to interments in the Congressional Cemetery.

The amendment was in lines 7 and 8, to strike out the words "in the form of the cenotaph heretofore provided."

The amendment was concurred in.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to order the legislative and executive business of the Senate will now be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned, resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed its legislative session; and

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I desire to call up the motion I entered on Friday last to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on Printing the report on the subject of the conduct of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall be compelled, in the interest of the post-office appropriation bill, to raise the question of consideration on this report, unless there can be some definite understanding by unanimous consent as to the time that shall be consumed. Every gentleman must perceive the absolute necessity of disposing of the appropriation bills at the earliest possible moment; and I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to ask the House to consider those bills to the exclusion of all other business until they shall be disposed of. The naval appropriation bill is now before the Committee of the Whole and ready for action. The post-office appropriation bill is almost disposed of in Committee of the Whole; and we are extremely anxious to dispose of it to-day. But, in view of the anxiety of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] to leave the city at an early moment with the committee appointed to visit New Orleans, I am willing that this report of the Committee on Printing shall now be considered if the House will give unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations shall have the floor in two hours from this time for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARD. I have charge of a special order for this morning after the morning hour; and I would not like it to be interfered with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Special orders have not yet been reached. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] proposes to call up a motion to reconsider the vote by which a report of the Committee on Printing was recommitted. The question of reconsideration takes precedence of many, if not all other motions; and the question of printing is also a matter highly privileged. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] desires to make a privileged motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill; but as a compromise, he asks unanimous consent that two hours from this time the House go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill. Is there objection to that arrangement?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD COMBINATIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that certain of the leading railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and in commerce from the inland States to the seaboard for exportation, have combined for the purpose of controlling said traffic, and have made and continue to make unjust discriminations in the carrying of such freights, whereby many industries have been crippled and are threatened with extreme prostration; and whereas numerous petitions have been presented during the present session of Congress praying for the passage of an act to regulate such commerce and to prohibit such discriminations: Now, therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised of the truth and extent of such alleged combination, and of the effect thereof, and of the most complete remedy therefor,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to investigate the allegations aforesaid, and report by bill or otherwise, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask where the action of the House, just taken, will place the special order in which I am interested?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The special order to which the gentleman refers comes up after the morning hour; but the morning hour has not been called this morning.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask whether that special order will come up after the post-office appropriation bill is disposed of?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman chooses to raise the question of consideration upon the post-office appropriation bill, the Chair will decide the question at that time.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is disposed to do that. I understand that he wishes his special order to come up after the disposition of the post-office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the special order in regard to reciprocity being made the order at the conclusion of the post-office appropriation bill?

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question then recurs on the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair heard no objection to its introduction.

Mr. PAYNE. I object.

Mr. HOPKINS. I make the point that the objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the objection does not come too late. The Chair did not ask whether there was objection to the introduction of the resolution. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection and allow the resolution to be adopted and the committee asked for appointed. This is an important matter and should be inquired into at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs two bills in order that they may be referred and the reports ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business being demanded, the House proceeds with the consideration of the report from the Committee on Printing, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I hope there will be no objection to the submission of the reports from the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I must proceed, as my time is limited.

REVISION OF STATUTES.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask unanimous consent in behalf of my colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] who is absent, to present a bill for reference only.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LAPHAM, for his colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3465) to amend section 5108 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EDWIN EBERT.

Mr. STRAIT. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his objection to my report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is on the floor.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, as I understand he wishes to submit some reports for reference only.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 940) for the relief Edwin Ebert; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, GRATIOT, MICHIGAN.

Mr. STRAIT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3331) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the Presbyterian church of Gratiot, Michigan, to erect and maintain a wooden building on the Fort Gratiot military reservation, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 3368) appropriating $9,000 to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Offices in Louisiana; when the Speaker signed the same.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, the Clerk will read the resolutions reported from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to certify to the proper authorities of the District of Columbia the testimony heretofore taken by the order of this House relating to the conduct of A. M. Clapp, as Congressional Printer, to the end that he may be indicted and prosecuted.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, is an officer who may be impeached under the Constitution of the United States, and report to the House at as early a day as practicable.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Appropriations of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to embody in the sundry civil bill to be reported by them to this House, and in which bill appropriations for public printing are made, the following sections, to wit:

SEC. —. That so much of all laws or parts of laws as provide for the election or appointment of Congressional Printer or Public Printer be, and the same are hereby, repealed, to take effect on the 30th day of June, 1876, and the President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a suitable person, who must be a practical printer and versed in the art of bookbinding, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office from and after the day aforesaid; he shall be called the "Government Printer," and shall be vested with all the powers and subject to all the restrictions pertaining to the officer now known as the Congressional Printer; he shall give bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, said bond to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and he shall receive a salary at the rate of $3,500 a year.

SEC. —. That the amounts appropriated for printing, binding, and blank-books for the several Executive Departments shall be placed under the control of those Departments, respectively, and expended by the heads thereof; and the head of each Department shall cause to be made in the month of July, 1876, and afterward in June and December of each fiscal year, a schedule of all blanks of regular forms and blank-books, and other printing and binding required for the ensuing five months of the year 1876, and subsequently for the following six months' use in that Department, so far as it may be practicable to make such schedule, and shall take proper measures to obtain proposals from various parties for furnishing said blanks and blank-books, and for executing the said printing and binding, or any part thereof, upon paper equal in quality and weight to the present adopted standard; and he is hereby authorized and required to contract for the said blanks and blank-books, and for the said printing and binding, or any part thereof, with the lowest responsible bidder, the successful bidder to give bond in such sum as may be determined by the head of the Department ordering the work for the prompt and faithful execution of the same: Provided, That a copy of the schedule aforesaid shall be furnished by the head of each Department to the Government Printer, and he is hereby required to submit at the earliest practicable day a statement to the said head of a Department, showing the cost of executing the work named in the schedule at the Government Printing Office; and the said head of a Department shall award such work to the Government Printer when it shall be found that his estimate of the cost thereof is the lowest or as low as the lowest bid; and whenever such work is executed at the Government Printing Office, it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to furnish with each and every document, pamphlet, blank, blank-book with or without printed headings, job of printing, or job of binding thus executed a bill or memorandum setting forth the number of copies; the quantity, weight, cost, and description of paper; the number of pages, the number of thousand ems printer's measurement, the cost of composition, making-up, and imposing, proof-reading, correcting, and press-work; the cost, if any, of stereotyping, electrotyping, lithographing, or engraving, including paper and printing; the cost of dry-pressing, folding, gathering, stitching or sewing, and binding, including materials. Whenever any work requiring the purchase of materials whose value exceeds $100 is awarded to the Government Printer, he shall prepare an estimate of the quantity and cost of the same for submission to the head of the Department ordering the work, and, upon approval, bids shall be invited by the Government Printer in such manner as the head of the Department may direct, and contracts shall be awarded by the last-named officer, contracts to be made in quadruplicate, for distribution as follows: One copy to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, one copy to the Department authorizing the contract, one copy to the Government Printer, and one copy to the contractor. It shall be the duty of the Department for which the work is to be done to designate some competent person in its employ to inspect the papers delivered under any contract as to quality, quantity, and weight, and no bills arising under such contract shall be paid except they bear the joint certificate of the Government Printer and an inspector as aforesaid, all accounts so certified and approved to be forwarded to the head of the Department authorizing the contract for payment. When the work is completed and delivered the Government Printer shall prepare an account in detail showing the cost of each item, as provided in this section, and present the same to the head of the Department for whom the work was done for payment; and, if correct, the same shall be paid in full, less the cost of the paper, by check upon the Treasurer of the United States, which check shall be immediately deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for the public printing and binding, to be drawn therefrom only upon requisition and warrant in the usual manner. Whenever the Government Printer shall complete any work which may be given him to do under the provisions of this act, he shall report to the proper Department the quantity, kind, and cost of the several papers remaining in his hands, and the same shall be held subject to the orders of the head of that Department: And provided further, That the beforenamed provisions shall also apply to the appropriations for printing and binding for the Library of Congress, and that it shall be the duty of the Librarian of Congress to issue schedules of the printing and binding required for said Library to contractors and to the Government Printer, and to have the said work done as it is in this section provided for the execution of the printing and binding for the Departments.

SEC. —. That the Government Printer shall, in his annual report to Congress, as required by existing laws, also render a detailed statement, in tabular form, setting forth the number of copies, amount and kind of work, and the cost of each document, pamphlet, blank, or other printed matter, executed in accordance with existing laws or by order of either House of Congress, arranging the various items under appropriate headings, as follows: Title or subject of work; number of copies; number of pages; number of thousand ems printer's measurement; cost of composition, proof-reading, corrections, making-up or imposing, and press-work; cost of stereotyping or electrotyping, cost of lithographing or engraving, including paper and printing; quantity of paper used, weight, description, and cost per ream; cost of dry-pressing; style of binding, cost of binding per volume, including folding, gathering and stitching, or sewing; total cost of each document, pamphlet, blank, or other printed matter; and the distribution of each.

SEC. —. That the Government Printer shall keep such a set of books as will show the complete transactions of the Government Printing Office under his direction, exhibiting the purchases of paper and other materials in detail, and the uses to which the paper and other materials so purchased have been applied, and enabling him to make the detailed statement called for in the preceding sections, both for work executed for the Departments and for Congress and the moneys paid by the several Departments for work done by their order; the said books to show the description, quantity, and cost of all materials purchased; the description and quantity thereof issued to the various departments of the Government Printing Office; the description and quantity thereof used in the various items of work executed; and the description and quantity of any paper or materials destroyed, lost, or of which fragments shall be sold. And it is made the duty of the Joint Committee on Public Printing to inspect, at least once a year, or cause to be inspected by a competent person, the books of the Government Printer, to ascertain whether they are kept in accordance with this section; and, if they are not so kept, it shall be the duty of the Joint Committee on Public Printing to certify the same through the presiding officers of their respective Houses to the President of the United States as a neglect of duty on the part of the said Government Printer, which shall be a sufficient cause for his removal from office.

SEC. —. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to pay no greater price for labor performed by printers, bookbinders, and other employés in the Government Printing Office for each hour's work or piece-work than the average price paid for an hour's work or for piece-work of the same description in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; nor shall it be lawful for him to employ any workmen not thoroughly skilled in their respective branches of industry, as shown by a trial of their skill under his direction.

SEC. —. That whenever it becomes necessary for the Government Printer to make purchases of materials not already due under contracts, he shall prepare a schedule of the articles required, showing the description, quantity, and quality of each article, and shall invite proposals for furnishing the same either by advertisement or circular, as the Joint Committee on Public Printing may direct, and shall make contracts for the same with the lowest bidder, making a return of the same to the Joint Committee on Public Printing, showing the number of bidders, the amounts of each bid, and the awards of the contracts.

SEC. —. That section 196 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, so amended that henceforth it shall be the duty of the heads of each Executive Department, except the Department of State and the Department of Justice, to furnish the editor of the annual abridgement of the message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents with copies of the reports of the various Bureaus and other subordinate offices of their respective Departments on or before the 1st day of November of every year; and it shall be the duty of the said editor of the abridgement, acting under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to compile such portions thereof as he may deem of the greatest public interest, with an alphabetical index, and to employ such assistants and copyists as he may deem necessary for the prompt performance of the work, at a cost for compensation and additional compensation not to exceed $1,500, to be paid under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing; and it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to have the said abridgement printed and bound before the close of the month of December in which the said message shall be delivered: Provided, That while it shall be the duty of the Government Printer to print copies of the reports proper of the heads of the Executive Departments, as provided in section 3798 of the Revised Statutes, it shall not be lawful for him to print the reports of the various Bureaus and other offices of the Executive Departments, nor shall it be lawful for the heads of Departments or their subordinate officers to have the reports of Bureaus or offices printed by any one at the public expense: And provided further, That the papers relating to foreign affairs accompanying the annual message of the President of the United States shall be transmitted to the Senate in writing with the aforesaid message, and the Secretary of the Senate shall at once transmit the same to the editor of the abridgement, who shall insert in that publication such of said papers as he may deem of public interest not exceeding the amount of fifty printed pages; and the publication of the annual volume of papers relating to foreign affairs be, and the same is hereby, discontinued.

SEC. — That from and after the close of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress the printing and binding of the proceedings and debates of Congress, in the same form as they now appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, shall be done by Franklin Rives, of Washington City, for the period of six years next ensuing, terminable after notice of two years on the part of either party, terminating at the expiration of a Congress, upon the terms stated in his proposal, to wit: Two and one-half mills per printed page of book edition, and seventy cents per volume for binding; the type to be of the same kind as now used in printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the pages to be made up of the same size as those of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the paper to be of the same description, weight, and quality as that now used for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the volumes to be as nearly as practicable of the same size and bound in the same style as the volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the stereotype plates or duplicates thereof to belong to the United States, the above-named sum of two and a half mills per printed page and seventy cents per volume for binding to embrace all charges made by the said Franklin Rives for the printing, binding, delivery, and all other work connected with the prompt publication of the proceedings and debates of Congress in daily and book form, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now published, and for the said stereotype plates: Provided, That the said Franklin Rives shall enter into good and sufficient bonds, in the sum of $100,000, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the faithful and prompt performance of his contract.

SEC. —. That it shall not be lawful for any printing or binding, other than that for Congress or for the Executive Departments, to be executed at the Government Printing Office; and all branch or other printing offices or binderies (except the printing office at the headquarters of the Signal Service Corps) now in the various Departments or Bureaus thereof, be abolished; and that it be the duty of the Government Printer to have all the materials belonging to the United States in the said printing offices and binderies transferred to the Government Printing Office, and that it be unlawful to have any printing or binding executed in any Department or Bureau thereof.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand a separate vote on each one of these resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sees no objection to that course being pursued.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have the right under the rule to demand a separate vote on each resolution if it contains a substantive proposition.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, your committee, in entering upon the consideration, and in making the inquiries directed by the resolution adopted by the House some time since, by which they were required to examine into the cost of public printing, and suggest reforms if such were needed, took all the means in their power to get information in regard to the question of printing done for the Executive Departments and for Congress. That information could only be obtained by calling upon the several Departments for reports of the work done. Letters were addressed to the heads of the various Departments, asking for a full and detailed report of the work done in each one of those Departments, and for each and every separate Bureau and office by the Government Printing Office during the two years ending December 31, 1875. The committee also asked for copies of all blanks, and other work executed. The answers were generally full and complete, but prior to about February, 1874, the Congressional Printer had failed to furnish the Departments with any bill or memorandum setting forth what he had charged for the work done. They could and did furnish specimens of the work executed for the period when no bills were furnished, but no prices were attached; and I will say here that prior to the time bills were furnished, the Departments possessed no means of knowing the condition of their appropriations, and were compelled to depend entirely upon information received from the Congressional Printer.

The committee received a great number of specimens or samples—and the reports were generally as full as could reasonably be expected—and for three months your committee has industriously labored for the purpose of ascertaining what this item of public printing has cost, and what it should properly cost the Government. No means were left untried to arrive at correct conclusions. The Congressional Printer and numerous employés from his office, including the heads of the various departments there, were examined fully. Full facilities were given to the Congressional Printer to make known every matter of interest or of public importance in regard to this matter.

In times past, as many of the older members here may remember, the question of public printing has engrossed much attention. Abuses grew up under the contract system which were of a damaging nature. The printing cost too much, and it was found impossible to remedy it. Upon the question of the contract system evidence had been given by members of both Houses of Congress. It had grown to be such an abuse that some remedy, it was felt, should be found for it. Upon this point I shall read from the remarks of Senator ANTHONY, in the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress, (Congressional Globe, volume 41.) He says:

The price of printing the post-office blanks, as of the other printing, is fixed by law; but by a monstrous evasion and perversion of the law, constructive charges were allowed four times greater than the just and legitimate charges. The types were set once a year, and charged for setting every day, often three or four times a day. I will explain the manner in which this was done. Two elements enter into the cost of printing these blanks, composition and press-work. Composition is setting the type; press-work is striking off the sheets after the type is set. The price of composition on a sheet of these blanks was $13; the price of press-work was $1 for a thousand sheets. The type, once set, would last for millions of impressions. It was generally stereotyped. If an order was given for one thousand sheets of blanks, the bill would be: for composition, $13; for press-work, $1—$14 a thousand. If the order was given for 10,000 sheets, the bill would be: for composition, $13; for press-work, $10—$23; or $2.30 a thousand. If the order was given for 30,000 sheets, the bill would be: for composition, $13; for press-work, $30—$43; or $1.43 a thousand; and all under the same law, and at the same nominal price. No charge should have been made for composition except in the first instance. Mr. Rives printed the blanks for nine years and never made a single charge for composition—not once, not in the first instance. He, a practical printer of great experience, was consulted in framing the law, and it never occurred to him that composition would be charged under it. He would as soon thought of guarding against an extra charge for ink.

I shall show later, Mr. Speaker, that the same system there spoken of, and justly condemned by Senator ANTHONY, has entered into the charges made at the Government Printing Office here.

It was deemed advisable, and discussion came up upon the question, to establish a Government Printing Office. I regret that my time will not permit me to go into details and quote at length from that discussion. Upon this question Mr. Burnett, in the Congressional Globe, volume 41, page 2504, made use of the following language:

> Now, when we have bought or built a printing establishment, when we have the presses and all the other necessary materials ready, how many employés will be found there? How much will it take to start this immense machine? How much will it cost to build the establishment, provide it with presses and other material, and then, how much will it cost to keep it in working order? All these are pertinent questions. With all due respect to the gentlemen who favor the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and who may, perhaps, know more about the public printing than I do, I must be permitted to say, that in my judgment, a few years' trial of such a vast concern will demonstrate its impracticability. It will prove the means, I think, of corruption that will smell badly in the nostrils of the people. It will, sir, in my judgment, be a heavy drag upon the Treasury. Hence I shall vote against it.

Senator Pugh spoke as follows, page 3060 of the Congressional Globe, volume 42:

> Now, sir, I am opposed to this Government Printing Office. It will be the worst job, the worst nuisance, an incubus that you cannot get rid of, unless you set it on fire and burn it down. Once let it be established, and it will be the greatest source of abuse and corruption. There will be committee of investigation after committee every session, to overlook it. I do not want any more departments added to this Government; I do not want any more establishments. We have got enough, too many, now; and I cannot understand why the business of printing cannot be left to the ordinary law of competition, as every other business is. If we want a house built for a particular purpose, and do not choose to build it ourselves, we hire some person to build it; we receive proposals from him; if he does it according to contract, we pay him; if he does not, we do not pay him; and I cannot conceive what there is of mystery about this matter to take it out of the ordinary rule. The experience of my own State is in favor of the contract system. The work is better done, more cheaply done, and more promptly done. It has been a great relief to us.

But despite the discussion, despite the remarks of gentlemen who appeared to speak with prophetic knowledge of what would follow the establishment of a Government Printing Office, it was established by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, and an evil was fastened upon the Government that has grown with years.

Now let me give a brief outline: The office of Superintendent of Public Printing was established by an act approved August 25, 1852, (Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 30.) The Superintendent of Public Printing was authorized to contract for the erection or purchase of a Government Printing Office, by joint resolution of June 30, 1860, (Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 117.) The office of Superintendent of Public Printing was abolished, and that of Congressional Printer created February 22, 1867, (Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 398.) John D. Defrees was elected Congressional Printer in February, 1867. In 1869 Mr. A. M. Clapp was elected, and has since held the office, a period of about seven years.

I have briefly referred to the manner in which the office has been managed, and under former rules the Executive Departments have had no knowledge of the prices charged for printing. Orders have been sent to the Government office for certain work, and until about two years since no bills have been furnished for the work done.

The heads of the Departments and Congress itself have had no control over the prices charged for work done for them.

The evident intention in the formation of a Government office was to get the work done at cost price. The Government furnished all the buildings and all materials. No taxes or insurance or rent enter into the computation of the cost of the printing for the Departments and for Congress. The theory, therefore, is a good one, that if there was anything to be made in the printing business the Government itself should have made it. But what has been the result?

I am free to say that if the proper system of economy had been pursued, if the office had been managed honestly and with an eye to the benefit of the Government, the printing should have been done as cheaply as by private parties, always subject, as Senator ANTHONY once said, "to the deduction that must be made for Government work in competition with private work." I do not pretend to quote the exact language of the Senator on this point, but I give the substance.

Now, there are two items of cost which should enter into the charges made by the Congressional Printer for the work done in his office, namely, labor and material. These items alone should be considered in computing the charges. We have had samples of much of the work executed at the Government office during the past two years. These samples have been submitted to experts, who have carefully examined every particular item; and what has been the result? But before doing this it would perhaps be well to glance at the manner of purchasing articles needed. The great majority of paper, it should be borne in mind, is purchased by contract under the supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses of Congress. But there are a great many "open-market" purchases (so-called) of binding material, of some classes of paper, the latter made when the need of the Government requires them to be purchased in "open market." We find that about $175,000 a year has been spent in the purchase of binding materials. We find distinctly that no efforts have been made by the Congressional Printer or by the foreman of the binding department to get these articles from the manufacturers or to get them at the lowest price. It is in evidence that these gentlemen have never made any attempt to protect the interest of the Government by seeking for these articles at the lowest price; but, on the contrary, orders have been made up and sent to one particular house (save in one case) for the purchase of this kind of material for the last seven years, and to one house alone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a private establishment doing a large business requiring one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of articles of a certain class would without question make all endeavor to get those articles at the lowest possible price at which they could get good articles. We here find that the Congressional Printer, charged with the responsible duty of doing all that he can to secure material at low prices, and thereby to save money to the Government, has failed to make any exertion to do so. We find still further that one gentleman from the State of New York, representing perhaps one of the largest houses in the country in this particular class of goods, came on to Washington in January, 1874, and told the Government Printer that he was paying too much for these articles, and that he himself was willing to furnish equally as good articles at a much less price. No attention whatever was paid to this. If the Congressional Printer had up to that time been acting ignorantly in this matter, he cannot plead that excuse after the information he received from the member of that firm. No attention was paid to this. A year elapsed, and in January, 1875, the same gentleman called on the Congressional Printer with a schedule showing the prices of all the articles he could determine from the report of the Congressional Printer of purchases made of binding materials during the preceding year, and offered to furnish the same quality of goods at a much lower price; he stated that he could furnish the material described in the schedule, and for which about $140,000 had been paid, for about $16,000 less than the Congressional Printer had paid, and he offered to give security to furnish equally as good materials as had been purchased and at the decreased prices. He was requested to send on samples, and he did so. A letter was sent to him expressing satisfaction with the samples, and one small order was given to him; and there the matter stopped. The Congressional Printer returned to the firm he had been patronizing for the last seven years.

A member of this firm testified that out of every fifty dollars' worth of gold-leaf sold by his house, forty-nine dollars' worth went to the Government Printing Office, and $1 to other customers. The same proportions hold good regarding many other articles.

Further, in regard to this subject, the firm from which the Congressional Printer has made these purchases was originally Campbell & Armstrong; the successors are John Campbell & Co. Mr. Garner, the junior member of the firm, was placed upon the stand. He testified that he had supplied the Government with binding materials, and that during all these years, almost without exception, he had charged the Government more for goods than he charged his ordinary customers. The House will bear in mind that when the Congressional Printer began his purchases of this establishment it was a small one, and did but a very little business; and to-day the purchases made by the Congressional Printer of this House exceed those made by all other parties.

To give one example of the manner in which these open-market purchases have been made, I will state that upon an investment of $879.25 in imitation gold-leaf this establishment made a profit of $570.25. The testimony is that the Congressional Printer originally gave the order in person to purchase from this establishment, and the practice has continued ever since.

It is further of interest, in considering this question of open-market purchases, to note that the member of the firm that the committee had upon the stand stated that in the great majority of cases, after he had received his order from the Congressional Printer, he went out and bought the goods ordered from manufacturers and large dealers, shipped them to the Congressional Printer, and, before paying for them, awaited the arrival of remittances from the Government and then paid for them. In other words, this vast sum of open-market purchases, averaging about $175,000 per year, has been disbursed by middlemen; and no effort has been made on the part of the Congressional Printer to obtain lower prices from manufacturers or others.

It is proper for me to say that a careful examination of the reports of the Congressional Printer—I hold in my hand at this moment a copy of the Twenty-third Annual Report of the Congressional Printer—fails to give information in regard to the kind and quality of articles purchased. I have had this report and others examined by experts, and it is impossible, in the great majority of instances, for them, as it is equally impossible for any gentleman upon this floor, to tell in many instances the kind and quality of goods purchased.

I called a paper-dealer from Baltimore, and he examined page 30 of the Twenty-third Annual Report of the Congressional Printer, referring to certain purchases of paper amounting to about $52,000. I put him upon the stand and questioned him as to what he would charge for the same articles of paper.

I have here his testimony. He testified, after a careful examination, that he would furnish the same papers, equal in quality in all respects, for about $40,000, or in that neighborhood. To be precise, the Congressional Printer's charges were $51,862 09, and the Baltimore merchant said that he would furnish the same paper for $40,894.54.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Why call a paper-merchant from Baltimore? Is that the paper mart of the United States?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. No.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Why not call a dealer from New York or Philadelphia?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I desired an expert to examine it, and called him.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. And you called an expert from Baltimore?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I will state further, for the benefit of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL,] that if I had called a paper-merchant from the markets farther east than Baltimore, I would have obtained lower prices than I have named.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Why did you not do it?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I will speak further on that point after a time. I desire to go into this particularly for the benefit of the gentleman from New York. This gentleman stated that it was impossible for him to arrive at the weight or the quality of the paper that he testified about, and consequently he took the very best articles of every kind there described and gave his estimates.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. He brought his prices from Baltimore, not from New York.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I do not know whether he brought them from Baltimore or not; he took the best papers of that class.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. You did not go to the paper marts of the United States to get your information.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I had information from a responsible, reliable gentleman, thoroughly acquainted with the paper markets.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. In Baltimore?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. With the paper markets of Baltimore, New York, Boston, and all the eastern cities; thoroughly familiar with them.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Why did you not call gentlemen from all those places to testify?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. That has nothing to do with the question at issue. What I have stated gives but a faint description of the condition of affairs relating to the open-market purchases, and I have not time to go into them. I could specify every article examined upon; and the statement would probably be of interest, as showing an utter disregard of all attempts to protect the Government. In conclusion of this subject, I will refer those curious to the testimony of Mr. Garner, reported at length in the testimony taken before the committee. It is instructive reading, and gives a better picture than I can portray of these matters.

This New York gentleman, representing the house from which hundreds of thousands of dollars of open-market purchases had been made, brought his books here at the request of the committee; and what did they show? You cannot in one case out of ten, from those books, arrive at the sort of goods he had furnished the Congressional Printer; and he so stated in his testimony. He stated further that no expert could take his books, unless he himself was present to explain them, and tell anything about the goods he had sold to the Government. These are facts, and stubborn facts. I saw the books; examined them myself; I had this man examine them before the committee, and he made these statements. That man, without any question as to his prices, (so he says,) without any question whether or not he was treating the Government fairly or unfairly, has been furnishing to this Government upon an average one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of goods every year and making upon them an enormous profit; and mark this, the firm of which he is a member are not large dealers, would not be termed manufacturers, but in the great majority of instances purchased the articles from somebody else and sent them on here.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman allow me another question.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Not at present; I will after a while. I want to get through with this branch of the subject.

I will close what I have to say in regard to this witness from New York by reading one question which I propounded to him and the answer which he gave. It was very near the close of his testimony. I ask the House to bear in mind that the sales he has made to the Government during the past seven years have exceeded the sales made to all other parties. I asked him this question.

> Question. What do you sell to the trade for?
> Answer. The same price, 10 per cent. off.

In other words, he would sell one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars' worth of goods to any supposed responsible house, running the risk of getting his money, at 10 per cent. less than he sold to this cash customer, the Government of the United States. Comment is unnecessary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must look at the comparative cost of binding and printing. I find that my time flies very rapidly, and I cannot go into the details as I should like to. We examined all the specimens, so far as it was possible for us to do so. In regard to the binding executed at the Government office, I received from the Treasury Department certain books, with the bills for binding. I refer to the samples sent by that Department simply because our information was to the effect that there the interests of the Government had been carefully guarded and prices watched so far as possible. The bills from the Government office for binding these books amounted to $1,824.70. I submitted the matter to binders of experience, men skilled in the business, for their computation. One of them stated that he would do this work for $822.48; the other, without knowing the figures of the one I just referred to, made his estimate, and it was $837.02. This work cost the Government, according to the report of the Congressional Printer, $1,824.70; and in these figures there is no profit calculated; it is supposed to be the actual cost of the work, while these gentlemen who gave me the figures I have just repeated left in each instance a margin for profit. Deducting from their estimated figures the profit, it gives not less than 250 per cent. of overcharge in this item alone; and the same thing runs through all the work we have examined to a greater or less extent.

I made an examination of the binding executed for the Congressional Library. I called upon the librarian and asked him to submit to me samples showing the different sizes and styles of the binding executed. He did so; and I caused estimates to be made. The Congressional Printer had charged $29 for a lot embracing, as the librarian informed me, the different sizes and styles of the books bound for the Library. Upon submitting these specimens to experts, I received from them their figures, amounting in one instance to $13.90, and in the other to $13.05 for the same work. In each case a margin for profit was left, showing upward of 100 per cent. of overcharge in those cases.

It is to be observed also that these parties did not take into consideration the fact of having a great amount of such work to do; they simply estimated for this one lot of books, precisely as if any gentleman on this floor had gone into their establishment and asked them to bind for him these twelve or fifteen volumes as a single job. They both stated in their testimony that if they had had twenty or thirty thousand dollars' worth of work to do they would have charged much less than the figures they named.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Did you tell these gentlemen that made these estimates who you were and what you came for?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. That makes no difference whatever; but for the gentleman's satisfaction I will explain. I had these books sent by Mr. Spofford to my committee-room; and when one of those gentlemen was placed on the stand I asked him to calculate in the presence of the committee what he would do the work for; he did so, and gave us the figures.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Had he ever done any work of that kind before?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. He has one of the largest private establishments in the country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. In the city?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. In the country. The other gentleman I subjected to the same process. He made the examination then and there, calculating every item that entered into the cost, and leaving a margin for his profit.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Not at present. The gentleman has expressed some uneasiness in regard to experts from New York. I beg to say to him and to the House that I sent for one of the most distinguished gentleman in New York connected with the printing business; and I examined him fully and carefully upon various matters.

I refer to Mr. Theodore L. De Vinne, of New York, one of the best men in his profession in this country, and perhaps in the world. I examined him carefully on all these points, and I beg to cite the result of some of his calculations. You will permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that one of the estimates on binding which I have referred to, where $1,800 was charged and an $800 estimate was given, came from that gentleman. He examined various samples and kinds of work. For instance, he examined the "Dead-Letter Office sale" I hold in my hand, marked X. I will read from the testimony:

> Question. Make an estimate of the pamphlet marked "X" as you believe it would be made by the printers of New York, Baltimore, or Philadelphia, if they had workmen by the piece, for one thousand copies.
> Answer. The paper for a thousand copies, four and one-third reams, at $8.50 a ream, $36.83; composition of sixty-six pages, at $2.70, $178.20; press-work of five forms, $5 a form, $25; binding of a thousand copies, $6; sum total, $246.03.
> Q. Is this the lowest price, or nearly the lowest price, for which this work could be done?
> A. It is not; this is the price which would be charged by the better class of printers, being charged at what are known as established rates. There are printers in the city who would do it for a much smaller sum.

The answers to these questions are to the point. Now, what did the Congressional Printer charge? He charged $645.75! If this was but an isolated case of overcharge, it might not be necessary to speak particularly of it; but it is one of many—almost all the items charged being in excess of what similar work may be procured in private establishments. The testimony of Mr. De Vinne should be examined carefully upon many other points.

Just here it may be well to state that in all the examinations and calculations made no estimate was taken of wear and tear, the deterioration of material. Upon this Mr. De Vinne says in a private letter:

> In making up the statement of a year's business, we always allow 10 per cent. on capital invested for depreciation of types and presses. For types, 10 per cent. is too little; for presses carefully used, 10 per cent. is too much; but on a ten years' average it comes out about right. Repairs, rent, insurance, and sundries of like nature are always about 15 per cent. of our receipts. In making up an estimate of cost or of what the cost of doing work should be in the Government Printing Office, these rates should be applied, for I don't think any economy in management could make them smaller.

If those matters had entered into the consideration of the question they would have made the discrepancy between the cost of the Government printing and the cost at responsible private establishments much greater.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, Executive Document No. 10, Forty-third Congress, second session, "Receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873." There is one page of long primer and six hundred and fifty-six pages of nonpareil type. I have had this examined carefully as to what it would cost if done in private establishments in this city. One estimate I have before me is $2,043.75. The estimates varied but a little. The Congressional Printer charged $4,781.15.

But I have not time to go into detail in reference to all matters; these examples serve to cover the whole ground. We find the same thing all the way through in reference to overcharges.

I now come to the question of Government binding. We find there has been wasteful extravagance, to use no harsher term, in the orders given by the Departments for various kinds and classes of binding. I hold in my hand a book, a bound book, "The Birds of the Northwest." You will observe by looking at it where some of the gold-leaf has been used so profusely. Of this book there were fifty bound, at a cost of $212.50, or about $4.25 per volume, for the binding alone. This work was done for the Interior Department. Here is the Report of the Secretary of the Interior, volume 1, for 1875, of which five hundred copies were bound, at a cost of $471.30, one hundred bound in the style which gentlemen can see, and four hundred in cloth. The cloth copies, according to the estimates, cost about twenty cents a volume, which would leave the cost of this bound copy at about $3.90 per volume.

In examining the report of the Secretary of War, by the way, I saw that $1,290 was charged for binding a few books. I could not understand it and made inquiries, and found that they were photographic views which had been bound at this great cost. The Secretary of War states, under date of March 16, 1876, that—

> The requisition for binding the Wheeler photographs was made by the Chief of Engineers in accordance with instructions from the Secretary of War. It is included in the report of the Chief of Engineers furnished your Committee on Printing and Binding for 1874 and 1875—No. 414 on the engineer list, and dated November 8, 1875—amounting to $1,292.50 for binding one hundred and ten volumes of photographs in half turkey. There were sixty volumes of twenty-five views each, bound on short edge, as per sample herewith: Cover, 15½ by 21 inches; thirty-four volumes of fifty views each, bound on short edge, cover 15½ by 21 inches, and sixteen volumes of fifty views each, bound on long edge, cover 18 by 22 inches.

The examination of witnesses, as well as the samples furnished, show that this same system of extravagance has prevailed for years past in reference to the binding and printing of the Government, and we have found nowhere that any effort has been made to put a stop to it.

I next come to the question of overcharges. The overcharges referred to in the contract system have prevailed here; the same system of "doubling up," or charging for work that has not been done.

This paper that I hold in my hand is what is termed a form of sixteen pages. These sixteen pages are made up in type, locked up in what is termed a chase, and put upon a press. The paper is put in and run through the press and comes out with sixteen pages printed on it.

Now, the complaint that was made heretofore in discussing the wrongs practiced under the contract system was that the contractor would print these sixteen pages—would tear them apart and charge sixteen times for the work. But what do we find in reference to the work of the Congressional Printing Office? We find this identical system carried out there, and it has been carried out there through all the books that I have examined.

Before I make a further explanation in regard to this, let me say that the charges were changed two years ago upon complaint of the Post-Office Department, as stated in the testimony of the Congressional Printer; a reduction of 40 per cent. was made in the charges against the Department. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask here if that change of 40 per cent. was made why had not the error been discovered before and remedied?

But now I am speaking upon the present charges. Look at this. Here is a form of sixteen pages. If these forms were made up of single-sheet reports there would be sixteen printed at once. Here are sixteen cut apart. Now the Congressional Printer prints off these forms of sixteen pages each. He tears them into sixteen pieces. He makes sixteen separate and distinct jobs of nineteen hundred copies each. And what does he charge? Not one press-work, but sixteen press-works. What is the result? He makes an overcharge of about $85 for press-work alone upon each and every form of that sort that he puts through his press. An examination of the books of the Congressional Printer shows that full press-work is charged upon each and every job of work, whether put through the press singly or combined with other jobs.

Then there are overcharges made in composition. We find by further examination of the Congressional Printing Office that a great many jobs are stereotyped there—hundreds of them—and that all that is necessary to do when an order comes from a Department is to take one of these out, lock it up in a chase, put it on a press, and print it. We find that in almost every such case full composition is charged, and charged every time the job is ordered. The books show that these charges have been made; that it is the rule to so charge.

Mr. Speaker, during the progress of the investigation we discovered that two classes of work were undercharged. One of these was the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and another was the work for the Supreme Court. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD had been taken from a private establishment in this city and the Supreme Court work was also taken from private parties in the city of Washington. For forty years the Congressional Globe had been printed by private parties here, and always to the satisfaction of Congress.

Speaking of the manner in which the work on the Globe had been performed, Senator ANTHONY (Congressional Globe, volume 93, page 1473, February 19, 1873,) said:

> I have several times borne my testimony, and I very cheerfully do it now, to the manner in which the work has been performed by the present contractors. It is as near perfect as anything of the kind possibly can be. This work is done easily, quietly, promptly, and we never hear from the contractors. I do not think that I have spoken to them more than once this session. They never come near us, but always send us their work well done.

In a discussion in regard to the publication of the debates, Senator ANTHONY (Congressional Globe, volume 73, page 1512) said:

> I have no doubt that the Congressional Printing Office can do this work as cheaply as it can be done by anybody, and that whatever money a contractor can make on it will be saved by the Government, subject, of course, to the deduction that must always be made for Government work in competition with private work. It always costs rather more.

And again, in 1872, (Globe, volume 88, page 1319,) he said:

> We investigated that matter and made a report to Congress on it three or four years ago. We then had an offer for the printing of the debates from the present contractors; we had proposals from a firm of printers, I believe, in New York, and we had an estimate of the cost at the Government Printing Office from the Congressional Printer. The cost at the Government Printing Office and the figures given by the New York parties were about the same, and were considerably less than those of the Globe, I think about thirty or forty thousand dollars less; but, upon a very full debate in the Senate, the committee, who recommended that the work be done at the Government Printing Office, were voted down by a vote of two to one. It was the opinion of the Senate and also the opinion of the House of Representatives that the amount which it was estimated would be saved by doing the work at the Government Printing Office was not worth the change; and although I was voted down, for I took the other side, it is my opinion now that we cannot profitably carry the publication of the Globe to the Congressional Printing Office. I do not think any officer holding his place by the votes of the Senate could print the Globe. I think nothing in Fox's Book of Martyrs would be equal to the sufferings which he would have to endure. [Laughter.] I think if we are going to print the Globe, we cannot do it any better than the way it is done now, unless there should be an edited edition of the Globe, something like Hansard's Debates. That would be a very great saving; and it would be a great convenience in many respects; but I do not know the man who would like to undertake the task of editing the Globe. I would not do it for $50,000 a year.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN (Globe, volume 73, page 1512) said:

> We are told this change will be a saving of $40,000; but how is that estimate made? That estimate is made not by a person who is going to take the contract and who is unaffected entirely by the question whether his estimate is correct or incorrect, and I have not a great deal of confidence in it. Besides, I believe it is the true interest of the Government to make as few contracts, to undertake as few jobs, whether in printing or in building railroads or canals, or anything of that character, as possible; but to make contracts with individuals and make them strictly and have them rigidly enforced.

Senator MORRILL, of Vermont, (Congressional Globe, volume 73, page 1512,) said:

> If this change should be made, I have no idea but that, instead of making $40,000 for every two years of congressional printing, we should run under at least $50,000 a year.

And again (page 1513) he said:

> I do not believe that we are on the road to retrenchment by making this change; but I believe that if it should be made we should revert and turn back to the same system within four years.

Senator Fessenden (Globe, volume 73, page 1513) said:

> As it stands now, the question is whether we should gain or lose by it. My opinion is that we should only lose by attempting to do it, because I think it is overburdening the Public Printer; and I think those men have done the work so well and so long that their judgment as to what they can do it for, as they certainly must be very desirous of getting the contract, is a good deal better than the judgment of anybody else.

Senator Hendricks (Globe, volume 73, page 1514) said:

> Mr. President, nothing is more deceptive than public estimates; we know that in the great body of the work that is done for the Government, the construction of public buildings and repairs and all that. Now, sir, I have very little confidence in the estimates that are presented here from the bureau of public printing, if it may be so called. I do not believe that this printing will be done at the Public Printing Office for the price that we are paying to the present company. I do not expect it to be done for that price. I know that the Government never does work as cheap as individuals do it. Ordinarily we can pay individuals for work done and a reasonable profit, and save money to the Government, rather than do it directly through the agents of the Government. This work has been carried on a long while by this office to the satisfaction of members of Congress. It reflects credit upon the Government, and I am very reluctant to see a change made. In the course of a Congress I believe it is now claimed that there can be a change made in favor of the Treasury of forty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars. When we come to test it by experience I think that the change will be the other way; it will cost that much more than it does now.

Senator MORTON (Globe, volume 73, page 1515) said:

> I have no faith myself in the Government directly procuring heavy work of this kind to be performed cheaper through its own immediate agents than by contract. It is contrary to all governmental experience. Wherever the Government has work to be done of a continuous or important character it has uniformly been found to be cheaper to let it out, under fair terms of contract, than to undertake to execute the work itself.

If the Government has a harbor to repair or construct, or any public work to do, it has been found cheaper by experience to let it out by contract than for the Government to undertake, through its own agents, to hire the hands and execute the work. The Government tried that experiment once in the construction of the Cumberland road. The construction of that road was first put under the care of engineers, with authority to employ superintendents and agents, to hire the hands and construct the road, without the intervention of contractors; and I believe it is a notorious fact that the work cost the Government at least twice what it would have cost if it had been let out under fair terms of contract; and more than that, it progressed far more slowly than it would have done if it had been fairly contracted for.

Why, sir, the operation of this principle is so well understood that railroad companies, private corporations, where they have a railroad to construct, will not undertake to construct it directly by their own agents. Some roads have attempted that; but they have been, I believe, uniformly unfortunate. I remember one instance where a railroad company undertook to build a road through its own superintendents, to employ hands, and superintend them; and after having partially constructed the road it was compelled to abandon that system and resort to the ordinary one of contract, where the work is let out to contractors under fair competition.

Now, sir, if the Government of the United States can save money by undertaking to execute a long and heavy work of this kind directly through its own agents, I undertake to say it will be the first time that that experiment has ever been successful. As I said before, it has been tried in regard to railroad companies, where the parties managing the company were directly parties in interest; and it has been found, even with regard to railroad companies, that it is to their advantage to let the work out to contractors and allow the contractors to make fair profits, and that they can construct the work cheaper and faster.

As this is the almost universal experience with regard to the Government in other particulars, with regard to corporations, with regard to the construction of all works of improvement, it seems to me there is no reason to suppose that the Government can execute this particular work cheaper through its own agents than it can by contractors, with fair competition.

The examination made of the cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that it has been undercharged ever since its establishment; that many and important items that were properly chargeable have been omitted, and in the main the prophecies of the gentlemen whose remarks I have quoted have been verified.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I hope there will be no objection to the time of the gentleman from Ohio being extended.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much more time does the gentleman desire? The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] proposes to reply, and the time allowed for this question is limited by order of the House.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I will try to finish in ten minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will that come out of the time of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not.

There was no objection, and the time of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, was extended for ten minutes.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, an examination of the books of the Congressional Printer, and a very careful examination, shows that the charges for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have been underestimated; in other words, that a system of undercharging has been pursued ever since the RECORD has been printed at the Government Printing Office. The undercharge for a short session of Congress reaches from $15,000 to $18,000. Taking an entire Congress, should the same system be pursued that has prevailed in the past, it will reach $40,000 of an undercharge.

The same statement applies to the Supreme Court work. We find there a charge for type-setting of but sixty cents a thousand ems, when it is well known that in addition to the sixty cents must be charged the cost of proof-reading, revision, extra corrections, and all that sort of thing—amounting to fully one-third of the price paid for composition.

I shall have to omit many matters on which I should have been pleased to have spoken with some detail, and must simply glance hastily at some of the matters presented in the new sections proposed by the Committee on Printing.

The first section abolishes the office of Congressional Printer, and authorizes the appointment of a Printer by the President of the United States, to take office on and after the 1st day of July next. At present the claim is made by the gentleman who occupies the position of Congressional Printer that he is not amenable to this House, although he does all the work for it and receives the appropriation for his work here. After being offered all the facilities in the power of the committee to explain these damaging charges against him, after he requested to be heard before the committee and the request had been acceded to cheerfully, he comes in and pleads the jurisdiction of the committee, interposing the plea that he is an officer of the Senate.

Another section provides for appropriations to the heads of the various Departments to be expended by them for the printing they require. We have seen how the contract system worked; we have seen to-day how the Government system works. Now this section provides that appropriations shall be made to the heads of the various Departments directly; that they shall ask for bids for work; that they shall also call upon the Congressional Printer to put his bid in giving the actual cost to the Government, and if his bid is found to be lower or as low as that of any outside party then he shall have the work. By this means we put a check on any contract and any contractors.

It is also provided that the Government Printer shall keep and make to Congress and each Department a detailed statement of each and every article of work executed for them, and that this exhibit shall show the cost of paper, labor, and all the other items properly chargeable in it. The books as now kept at the Government office are imperfect, and do not give a correct statement of the affairs of the office. What appears to be absolutely necessary is a system of checks and balances which will secure exact and reliable accounts of the cost of each and every job of printing and of binding in detail. Such a system of accounts will show also the value of the paper and of the binding material used during each year, and will balance the gross amount of those materials purchased. It will also show the amount of composition, the cost of proof-reading, and correction, the cost of press-work, and other items of labor, which will balance the gross cost of labor.

An important provision is made in one of the sections for the preparation and publication of an abridgment of reports of chiefs of Bureaus and other subordinate offices in the Executive Departments.

A large item of the expense of congressional printing is the publication of the reports of the chiefs of Bureaus and other subordinate officers in the Executive Departments. These reports were originally intended for the information of the heads of the respective Departments to which the Bureaus and other offices belong; but of late years each one has been magnified into a separate document, often forming one or more volumes. In some Bureaus clerks are occupied during several months of the year in compiling these volumes, when the desired report of the actual workings of the Bureau might be written on half a dozen sheets of paper. Journals of travels and explorations, essays on ordnance, finance, and navigation, with other topics entirely out of place in what should be a single report of Bureau or office work for the information of the Secretary in compiling his annual report to the President, are given without stint. And the Government has not only paid for the printing of these in a series of volumes, but extra editions have been published for distribution by the Bureaus or offices issuing them, and many copies have been bound in the most expensive style. It is within bounds to estimate the annual cost of the printing and binding of these Bureau and office reports at upward of $75,000 per annum for the past fifteen years.

Meanwhile a volume has been issued from the Government Printing Office, compiled under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, which has given the cream, if the expression may be used, of these Bureau and office reports, in addition to the message of the President of the United States and the reports of the heads of the Executive Departments. No complaint has ever been made that this abridgment has not given a fair and complete idea of every Bureau or office report, with the important statistical tables and records of what has been the work of the year.

Under the existing law reports of Bureaus or offices in the Departments have to be handed to the Congressional Printer on or before the 1st day of November. By having the manuscript placed in the hands of a competent editor, at that time, he, with such assistance as the Joint Committee on Public Printing may deem necessary, can make the abridgment as it is now made from the printed reports, and it can be ready for distribution at the close of the year. An estimated expenditure of $1,500, or less, for this compilation will save from fifty to seventy thousand dollars per annum. The abridgment will also give, generally speaking, all necessary information concerning the details of Bureau work for the use of Congress, and should any more extended information be needed, it can easily be obtained from the Bureau or office.

By making it unlawful to have these minor documents printed at public expense a large saving is guaranteed, and the efficiency of the public service is in no way impaired. The annual message of the President, the annual reports of the Secretaries, and the abridged Bureau and office reports will supply ample and accurate information concerning the workings of the Executive Departments of the country for the press, the public, and Congress.

A word in conclusion. An examination of the Government Printing Office and its operations for seven years past shows that $11,901,351.70 have been expended for public printing and binding, being an average of a little upward of $1,700,000 per annum. Now I say here distinctly, knowing the full import of every word that I utter, that this printing and binding has cost the Government $500,000 a year more than it ought to have cost, $500,000 per year more than it would have cost under a carefully guarded system, and in this estimate I leave a large margin for profit. I know what I say is true, and the evidence taken during the investigation demonstrates the correctness of the assertion. This thing has been going on for years; these exorbitant charges have been made upon the books of the office; these large sums have been expended, and until this inquiry no wrong had been discovered. I do not propose to charge the responsibility for this upon anybody. It is one of those things that might have occurred under any circumstances; but, in my judgment, if the proper steps had been taken in the past, the wrongs and abuses practiced in the Government office would have been discovered, and some remedy proposed. If, as is now proposed in one of the sections, a regular and careful examination of the books had been made, the overcharges would have come to light, and a check been placed long ago upon the system of so-called "open-market" purchases—the evils of the system exposed whereby the Government has been defrauded of $500,000 a year, an aggregate loss in the past seven years of fully $3,500,000. No private establishment in the country could have stood the operations of such a system, and it is in evidence that no private establishment could have been conducted in this manner without coming to speedy bankruptcy.

The committee examined about fifty witnesses. The Congressional Printer requested that certain employés in the Government office be called and examined, and all he desired to have called were sent for and examined upon the questions which had arisen during the progress of the investigation; he was also informed that he might bring forward (if he so wished) other witnesses. But we did not send for certain important witnesses from the Government Office. And why? We omitted to call a number of the workmen in the establishment, all of whom would have proven valuable witnesses, because if we had called them, and they had come forward and testified, they would have been discharged from their positions, as was done in a similar case in times past. That class of men we did not send for; we sent for every man whom we were called upon to send for.

I now call for the previous question upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted to the committee.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman call for the previous question after one hour's debate?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. No, sir; I only call for the previous question on the motion to reconsider. When that motion prevails I shall yield to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BALLOU.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the report of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BALLOU. I now desire to have read the minority report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The investigation and report of the majority of the committee was made under a resolution of the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Printing of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and ascertain the cost of and charges made for work done for Congress and the Executive Departments by the Government Printing Office, and what similar work costs and can be done for in other offices; that they ascertain the cost of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the cost of having it printed by responsible private parties; that they ascertain whether the printing for Congress and the Executive Departments is done as economically as it should be, or as it may be done by contract or otherwise by private parties; that they inquire into the extent of publications and printing ordered by the Executive Departments, and whether any limit should be made upon such publications and printing beyond what is expressly authorized by law; that they make thorough examination into the operations of the Government Printing Office, with a view to learn whether a different management may be made or plan adopted to lessen the expenses of the Government for the various items of printing required; and that the committee be instructed to make to this House a full report of their investigations, together with the testimony taken by them, and to that end the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to use a short-hand reporter."

The Government printing is done under the supervision of a Congressional Printer elected by the Senate. The Constitution provides that the President "shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors * * * and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law," &c.

The Constitution also provides, in regard to each of the two Houses of Congress, that it shall choose its officers.

By the act of February 22, 1867, it was enacted:

"That the Senate shall elect some competent person, who shall be a practical printer, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office. That the person so elected shall be deemed an officer of the Senate, and shall be designated 'Congressional Printer.'"

Whether Congress can create an office the duties of which are public and by designating it an office of the Senate or an office of the House, and thereby withdraw from the President the constitutional power of appointing the person to fill and exercise the office, need not be discussed here. Because, conceding the act to be unconstitutional, it would follow that the Congressional Printer is not an officer at all. But, assuming the act to be constitutional, it is manifest that the present Congressional Printer is an officer of the Senate; and the House has no more authority to inquire into the manner in which he performs his duties than it has to inquire into the manner in which the Secretary or the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate performs his duties.

As an officer of the Senate, the Congressional Printer is not subject to impeachment, because only officers of the United States, or persons who have held such office, are liable to impeachment.

From this it follows that neither the House nor a committee of the House has any authority or jurisdiction to inquire into the conduct of the Congressional Printer with a view to impeachment, or for the purpose of passing any criticism upon the manner in which he has performed his duties. It is believed that this House would be very restive should the Senate institute investigations in regard to the manner in which the officers of this House perform their respective duties.

But it is due to this House to say that the resolution under which the Committee on Printing has proceeded contemplated no such action, but intended only an inquiry upon which subsequent legislation, if found necessary, should be based.

I therefore dissent from so much of the report of the committee as pretends to criticise or censure the conduct of the Congressional Printer; upon the ground, first, that the committee was charged by the House with no duty in that behalf; and secondly, because, even conceding that the resolution could be construed as giving such authority, it was beyond the jurisdiction of the House, and utterly void.

I also dissent from all that part of the report, because in my opinion the testimony fails to show a case justifying any harsh criticism or condemnation of the Congressional Printer.

I pass without particular mention the course pursued by the committee in the examination of witnesses, the fact that the examination was held in secret, and exhibited a purpose to travel beyond what was necessary to form the basis of legislation to cast discredit upon the Printer. But from the testimony as taken I am unable to find any just ground for condemnation in regard to the manner in which the business of this branch of the public service has been conducted. In one or two unimportant particulars there may have been such departures from the strict letter of the law as lawyers would denominate irregularities. But in no instance has the Treasury been defrauded of a cent; and in no instance is it even pretended that the Printer, or any friend of his, has profited one cent from any contract, business arrangement, or transaction of his office. Indeed, the proof, elicited by questions not very friendly to the Printer, proves the negative affirmatively.

There is, therefore, no ground upon which any censorious criticism of the Printer can be based.

It is said that the Departments have been charged too much for printing and binding. But it is to be borne in mind that appropriations of definite sums are made for the printing and binding of each Department, and when that limit is reached their printing and binding must stop; so that the only result of charging a Department too much is to limit the amount of its printing and binding, and every overcharge is a diminution of its quantum of printing, and pro tanto a saving to the Government. In no case does any money pass between the Departments and the Printer on this account, and in no event can he be benefited by an overcharge to a Department.

It is said that the Printer has paid too much for material, and that by resorting to manufacturers better terms might have been made. This, however, is mere matter of opinion; and the witnesses relied upon to establish the charge had such manifest interest in changing the policy of the Government with regard to its own printing and binding as to greatly diminish the weight of their testimony. In this particular, also, the testimony shows that the Printer was in no way interested or benefited, and that the persons with whom he dealt did not, on the average, make more than 15 per cent. above actual cost, which, in view of the amount of stock they had to keep on hand, involving heavy insurance and interest on the investment, cannot be regarded as an unreasonable profit.

I cannot avoid the conviction that the majority not only forgot the primal object of the investigation as set forth in the resolution under which they acted, but that they were largely influenced by a desire to re-instate Franklin Rives to the profitable printing of the proceedings and debates of Congress, even at a much higher rate than the Government is at present paying therefor, and that, too, by positive enactment in his favor, without opening the work to competition.

It is impossible to overlook the fact that the testimony of many of the printers, who have been willing witnesses, may have been prompted by the hope that by destroying the present system they would acquire profitable contracts with the Departments.

It is my belief that the present system should be adhered to, as the most convenient, economical, and satisfactory method of doing the Government printing; and that a departure from this system, while it would result in fat jobs to individuals, would cause depreciation in the quality of work and increase the expense to the Government.

Respectfully submitted,

L. W. BALLOU.

Mr. BALLOU. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not able to be present during the last part of the time of the examination of witnesses on the investigation of the Government Printing Office, and to consult with the committee on the report. I only heard it read on the day it was reported to the House. Though surprised at the conclusions to which the committee had come, I at first thought that I would only make as brief and clear a statement as I could of the reasons for my dissent from the majority of the committee, and leave the matter with the House, without a minority report. But upon further consideration, as the character and reputation of one whom I believed to be upright and honorable was assailed, I felt it my duty to do for him what under a reverse of positions I should wish to have done for me, and the cause of justice and truth.

It is a very common thing in high party times to assail and vilify the reputation of those who may seem to stand in the way of our personal success or party triumph, but, without just cause, it is one of the darkest features of our present civilization.

Character is our richest treasure to keep, and all that we have that is worthy transmission, and he who takes it from us makes us poor indeed.

The great responsibility of the office of Congressional Printer, with its complicated and onerous duties, demands a lenient judgment unless there is good evidence of intentional fraud.

Perhaps there is no department in the Government more trying to a faithful officer anxious to do his duty in its varied and multiplied relations than that of the Congressional Printer. He not only has the charge of one of the largest printing establishments in the country, but must also carry on the separate business of a stereotype foundery, an extensive bindery, and a large mercantile business. He is also subject to the orders of both branches of Congress, the executive and its several Departments, and, what perhaps is still more trying, the importunities of members of Congress for various favors and accommodations. Add to these the printing of the RECORD, which is equivalent to a daily paper, during the sessions of Congress, and consider that more than a thousand hands are employed in performing the necessary labor, and it will not be strange if some imperfections should be found in the complicated workings of the machine.

Doubtless there have been mistakes, inaccuracies, and perhaps sometimes looseness in the performance of the work necessary to keep all in order and moving on harmoniously; yet the testimony, though in secret, and to a great degree ex parte and seemingly summoned to confirm presumed guilt, finds no corruption or fraud in the head of the house or of any of the subordinates.

The specific charges and resolutions looking toward the indictment and impeachment of the Congressional Printer, an officer of the Senate, and not of the House, seem to have been paramount to every other consideration in this investigation.

I wish briefly to notice these charges in the order in which they are recapitulated in the majority report.

1. The extra cost of work, if true, should not be charged altogether upon the Congressional Printer, as Congress makes eight hours a legal day's work, while in most private offices ten hours is the rule, making a difference of 25 per cent.; and the printers' union, on the ground of extra expense of living in Washington and the inconstant work in the Government Office, demands higher wages than the average in other cities.

2. Incompetency. The tree should be judged by its fruits. The neat and workman-like appearance of the Government office in all its departments is the uniform testimony of all visitors. The promptness and admirable manner in which the work is produced, whether bills or books, reports or RECORD, testify of care and ability and is the best answer to this charge.

3. Cost of Record incorrectly reported. It would almost seem by the strenuous effort to take the RECORD from the Government office and place it in private hands at a higher price than is now charged that there was some interest besides the Government's that was to be looked after. For I am assured that though it is difficult to give the exact cost of any particular work where so many kinds are carried on at the same time, yet the reported cost of the RECORD is a very close approximation to the reality.

4. The work done for the Departments excessive. I think this is true; and we may include the legislative department with its superfluous volumes of investigating testimony. Very much here may be judiciously abated with a great saving to the Government.

5. General extravagance. This is a sweeping but indefinite charge, and must have reference to prices paid for labor and material, as there are no salaried supernumeraries, no pay for titles, no stylish "turnouts;" only those who work get pay in this office; yet in the purchase of material it is quite probable that, with judicious management, a saving can be made, but not to that extent which the testimony of witnesses anxious for Government patronage would seem to indicate.

6. False vouchers. This charge is based on the ground that some blank-books, owned by Philp & Solomons and needed by the Treasury Department, were transferred to the same through the agency of the Government Printing Office in a manner perhaps which was not technically legal. It should be borne in mind, first, that the Treasury Department, which needed the books, had no money to be used in their purchase; second, that the Government Printing Office could not under the law buy books, but could buy paper, and that to accommodate both Departments a bill was made out for paper, and the goods transferred to the Treasury Department. By this arrangement all parties were accommodated and the Government suffered no loss.

7. Detained money contrary to law. The Government Printer is allowed to draw from the Treasury on his bond $53,000; his pay-roll is oftentimes considerably more than that amount, and by retaining money which he receives from various sources and adding it to the amount which he can draw from the Treasurer he is enabled to complete his monthly pay-roll and then deposit the vouchers in the Treasury as so much to be placed to his credit as money received. Perhaps the letter of the law may be violated, but not its spirit.

8. Government money deposited in bank. This is not strictly accurate, as only checks have been deposited in bank, received from various sections of the country and placed there for collection, which was the very best course to take.

I have thus, as briefly as I could, stated my general impressions in relation to this investigation, and my conviction that the Congressional Printer is an honest, upright, and faithful public servant, needing counsel and assistance rather than censure, and that the most unwise thing that the Government can do would be to surrender its ownership and control of the Printing Office or any of its departments, and become dependent on and subject to private contractors. With these views I submit the minority report to the consideration of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON Mr. Speaker, at an early day of the session of Congress a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on Printing to investigate the books and accounts of the Congressional Printer; to inquire into the affairs of the Government Printing Office; the cost of printing for Congress, and the several governmental Departments; the comparative cost of having it done in said office and by private contract; whether proper economy has been practiced in this branch of the public service; whether the amount of public printing may not be lessened; and requiring said committee to make full report of said investigation, together with the testimony taken.

Your committee entered upon this duty at once, and have labored faithfully and diligently to evolve the truth and arrive at just and proper conclusions in respect to the several propositions contained in said resolution. We found many difficulties meeting us at every step, arising from the chaotic condition of things in said office. There seems to have been wanting proper system in keeping the books, and a well-planned scheme to cover up and hide from public scrutiny all the transactions of its officers.

We have personally examined, and had examined by experts, the books, so far as any have been kept; we have called before us about fifty witnesses, embracing the Congressional Printer, his book-keepers, foremen, and others of the establishment; we have examined dealers in all or most of the articles used in the same; we have gone into the character of labor done, the prices paid, and a comparison of those prices with such as are paid outside of it; the receipt and disbursement of money, the cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the cost of Department printing, and indeed into every matter tending to show the management of the office, its true state and condition. In the report which we have made to this House is to be found the result of our labors.

The task has been by no means a pleasant one, but has subjected us oftentimes to harsh and unjust criticisms in the public prints, and to false and slanderous reports by interested parties.

It should be remembered by those who indulge in these criticisms that the task is not one self-imposed, but thrown upon us by act of this House. We are not to be understood, however, as wishing to apologize for anything we have done. Official position ever carries with it the corollaries of duty and responsibility. Having assumed the one, we can neither shun nor avoid the others, unless at the expense of conscience, and a disregard of truth and justice.

This axiomatic truth applies with equal force to every department of Government. The ministerial peace officer who arrests the criminal and shuts him up in prison finds no pleasure in it, but duty and responsibility urge him forward. The jury that renders the verdict of guilty against him would listen to the plea of mercy and bid the prisoner go free, did not duty and the law stand in the way. The judge who pronounces the sentence, it may be, signs the death-warrant, in feeling and in heart revolts at the act, but duty and official responsibility rise up and assert claims which cannot be disregarded nor postponed. Society must be protected, and the strong arm of the law is properly invoked to guard the weak against the strong, the innocent against the guilty, the honest and just man against the knave and plunderer.

Another thing should be borne in mind, that the damaging facts and astounding revelations which have been brought out in evidence and reported to this House in relation to the Congressional Printer and Government Printing Office are not mere skeletons of events long since transpired, which ought to rest in the grave of oblivion and which are now exhumed for sensational purposes; but they are things of to-day, practical, tangible issues, which as Representatives of the people we can neither ignore nor palliate. As honest fiduciaries of public trusts we must apply the corrective, and if cautery and the knife be necessary, let them be applied with a steady, skillful hand, that the body-politic may be saved from total depravity and civil government from ultimate disintegration.

In this spirit your committee have begun and carried on the work to this point, and it now remains for this House to sit in judgment on the case. That I may not fail in the discharge of my duty as an integral part of it, I ask the indulgence of the House while I allude to some parts of the testimony, apply the law to it, and state my conclusions.

There is much in this case to call forth severe animadversion; but I shall endeavor in the further remarks I am called upon to make to sink the partisan, the politician, and even the prosecutor, and give utterance to no sentiment nor word which shall bring the tinge of shame to the face or sorrow to the heart when the heat and excitement of the present hour shall have passed away and I come to read what I now say in calmer times and in the light of other days.

Mr. Speaker, we are too prone to forget that every word that escapes us in debate in this Hall, every unguarded expression conveying more or less than the truth, every pungent satire hurled at each other half in anger and half in merriment, every unkind word wounding the sensibilities of members, every unfounded charge affecting the reputation of those inside or outside of this House, every unsound opinion, false theory, or impracticable idea uttered upon this floor is caught up by means of the phonographic art, conveyed to the records of the House, and becomes a history of the times.

In view, then, of the responsibility resting upon me in dealing with the character of a fellow-man, standing in the forum of conscience, I am impelled by a sense of duty to prefer against A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, the following well-considered charges, namely:

First. A want of proper qualifications and total incapacity to fill the office of Congressional Printer.

Secondly. Gross and unpardonable malfeasance in the management of said office, resulting in heavy pecuniary loss to the Government.

Thirdly. Embezzlement of money of the United States, as declared and defined by the statutes thereof.

Upon the hypothesis that the evidence proves him to be guilty of these charges, I assume that for the first, namely, incapacity, he should be summarily dismissed from office; for the second, namely, malfeasance resulting in damages to the Government, his official bond should be put in suit and the Government indemnified for losses as far as practicable; for the third, namely, embezzlement, he should be impeached before the Senate, if the proceeding will lie, and indicted and tried criminally before a court having jurisdiction of the case.

As to the charge of "incompetency" I might rely confidently upon the entire want of system in the management of every department of the establishment, but especially in the matter of keeping books, which is so imperfectly done as to be beyond his own power to explain, and totally incomprehensible, either to his own clerks or to the most skillful experts we could bring to our assistance. To leave nothing to implication, however, but to establish his total unfitness for the office, I read extracts from his own deposition taken before the committee. These details cannot but prove irksome to the House, but nevertheless should command its attention, for its judgment is to be pronounced upon them. My interest in this matter is no more than that of every other member, and therefore I may invoke a patient hearing of what I have to say.

The deposition of A. M. Clapp:

Question. What percentage is charged for proof-roading, where proof-reading is charged?

Answer. I cannot answer you as to the percentage, because I do not know really, where proof-reading is charged, in what specific percentage it is charged.

Q. What precentage is charged for making up?
A. I cannot answer you that, the specific percentage. If I had known that you would ask me that, I would have brought memoranda of it.
Q. What charge is made for making up?
A. Where we charge the composition in document-work, I cannot tell you what percentage is charged for making up, if there is any distinct percentage.
Q. What percentages are allowed for proof-reading and making up of piece-work?
A. That I cannot answer now.
Q. I have here a report from the Secretary of War, giving a list of clerks and others employed in the respective Bureaus in the War Department, (Executive Document No. 176, Forty-third Congress, second session,) of which one hundred copies were printed for the War Department, and for which you charged $91.21; is that correct?
A. I cannot tell you anything about that until I go to my books.
Q. I have a copy of this document from the document-room here, which evidently shows that it is a reprint. Here is the same sort of a document, (Executive Document 275, Forty-third Congress, first session,) letter of the Secretary of War, referring to the resolution of the House of April 13, 1874. I find that you printed fifty of these for the War Department, and charged $17.18 for the fifty. Do you know whether that is a reprint or not?
A. I don't know anything about it.
Q. I have here War Department numbers 67, 143, 159, the numbers referring to the sample of the work sent from the Department to me. One is the annual report of the Secretary of War of the operations of his Department for the year ending June 30, 1874. Can you tell whether that is a reprint?
A. I cannot tell you whether it is a reprint or not, because I do not keep those books or accounts, and it is not possible for me to tell.
Q. Is it or is it not customary for the Secretary of War to order extra copies of his reports?
A. That I cannot say.
Q. If any errors had been discovered, would they appear on your books?
A. If we had discovered errors I think they would have appeared on the books.
Q. I mean this: if you had made an overcharge, through inadvertence or otherwise, would you discover it in making your settlement at the end of the year or when you made your report?
A. No, sir; I do not think that I should discover it. It would be liable to pass into my report.
Q. If the sum-total of charges made in your books should exceed the cost of material and labor, where would the correction appear on your books?
A. I do not know that a correction would appear on my books.

It will be seen that eleven questions were put to him in the above, all pertinent to the matters of investigation, affecting the interest of Government he professes to represent and involving his character as an officer in the management of an establishment costing about $1,600,000 annually, and yet to the plainest questions, with his books all before him, he responds, "I cannot answer;" "I cannot tell;" "I do not know anything about it;" "That I cannot say;" "I do not think I would discover it," referring to mistakes made in the way of an overcharge made for work done; "I do not think I would discover it," the mistake; "It would be likely to appear in my report"—all of which answers show a degree of stupidity or turpitude, or both, almost incredible.

But again:

Q. Did you make a special purchase of Russia leather cowhide for the RECORD; and, if so, for what and to what amount, and where?
A. That I cannot tell.
Q. Do you know whether you made a special purchase?
A. I do not know anything about it.
Q. Have you made any repairs on the presses on which the RECORD is printed, and where have you charged them?
A. That I cannot answer.

Still his answers are not more intelligent or satisfactory: "I do not know anything about it;" "That I cannot say." I now propose to sound his intelligence upon another point:

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Question. Have you collected the amount due for those books ordered and delivered?
Answer. As far as possible, we have.
Q. If there are delinquents from whom you are not able to collect these several amounts, on which one of your books would this be made to appear?
A. I am not sure that the books show where we do not collect the money. It is possible that there is a memorandum-book.
Q. Do you think it a proper system of book-keeping, and acting in good faith to the Government, which you represent, to deliver Government property to outside parties, and make no record of the fact in your books?
A. I stated there might be a memorandum-book of accounts.
Q. In the report which you have made of your acts and doings as Congressional Printer, have you made any showing whatever of those delinquencies, what amount has been lost, and who are the debtors for such amount?
A. I did make such a report as that some years ago on call.
Q. You say there may be a memorandum-book kept of such things. Do you know that there is any such book kept; and, if so, have you submitted it to this committee for inspection?
A. I do not know that I have. I know there ought not to be such a book, because there ought not to be such transactions.
Q. If your office were vacated, and you ceased to be Public Printer, what knowledge would the Government have of those transactions, and what opportunity of collecting what might be due to the Government, if they are not put on your books with other transactions?
A. If there was no book, there would be none.
Q. Is there, or not, a considerable amount of money—say $800 or $1,000—due to the Government from Morrison, bookseller of the city, for books and documents furnished him from the Congressional Printing Office?
A. Not that I know of. I really do not know the fact that he owes anything. I do not think he does owe anything under my administration.
Q. Does he, or not, owe a considerable amount of money for reports of the decisions of the Court of Claims, furnished by you from year to year, which has not been settled?
A. I do not know that he owes anything.
Q. Have you not your books before you, and cannot you tell from them?
A. This cash-book shows money that has been paid, not money that has not been paid.
Q. Do you not know that he has been in the habit of receiving reports of the decisions of the Court of Claims, and five hundred copies of every volume that has come out since that court has been organized?
A. I do not know that he has.
Q. If he has, should not your books show that?
A. If he has the books would show it; but I do not think that they would have been continued to have been furnished to him without pay.

It is in proof by Morrison, Solomons, Parker, and others, book-sellers in Washington, that they have bought large numbers of books, documents, and other printed matter from the Government Printing Office, the same being Government property sold by Mr. Clapp and his employés, of which no account has been taken on the books of the Congressional Printer, for which a part of the money has been paid, as appears by receipts filed with the testimony in this case, and the balance is still outstanding and unpaid, and has remained so for years, while the parties owing have remained solvent all the while, and only awaited the presentment of the account. All these sales have been made in defiance of the law, which reads as follows:

If any persons desiring extra copies of any document printed at the Government Printing Office by authority of law shall, previous to its being put to press, notify the Congressional Printer of the number of copies wanted, and shall pay to him, in advance, the estimated cost thereof, and 10 per cent. thereon, the Congressional Printer may, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, furnish the same. (Section 3869 of the United States Revised Statutes.)

Yet Mr. Clapp, in ignorance or defiance of said law, has disposed of the public property, making no entry upon his books of any character of a large proportion of said sales. Every sane mind called to consider these facts is forced to one of two conclusions, either that he was ignorant of the law and his duty thereunder, and is consequently unfit for the office, or else that his object was to appropriate the proceeds of those sales to his own use and leave no traces on his books of the transaction. If his ignorance disqualifies him for the office, much more then his dishonesty.

I cannot pursue this question of incompetency any further, as I think enough has been brought to the attention of this House and to the country to show his utter unfitness for the responsible office he pretends to fill.

MR. CLAPP'S SYSTEM OF BOOK-KEEPING.

I next call the attention of the House more specifically to the manner of keeping books in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. Clapp, in response to a question, gives his opinion of it as follows:

I think the system of book-keeping is perfect in its details, so as to show clearly what becomes of every quire of paper that is used in that office. My books will vindicate themselves or impeach themselves, one of the two.

When interrogated a little more closely, he admits that they do not show quite distinctly all that might be expected of them. Hear the subjoined answers:

Q. Do your books in which the work done is charged against the legislative and executive departments exhibit statements of the condition of the appropriation as shown by the books of the Treasury?
A. They do not bear any relation to my accounts at the Treasury at all.
Q. Is it possible to tell from your books what amount of waste is made in the bindery alone?
A. No, sir; I think not, unless I am mistaken in regard to the manner of keeping the books.
Q. If the sum total of charges made in your books should exceed the cost of material and labor, where would the correction appear on your books?
A. I do not know that a correction would appear on my books. I do not know that such discoveries have been made.
Q. From a comparison of your books and your vouchers, do the same appear to agree or to tally one with the other?
A. I have never compared my books and my vouchers, because my books do not bear any relation to my vouchers.
Q. I hand you a check, signed by W. H. Morrison, dated September 7, 1875, payable to A. M. Clapp, Public Printer, or order, for $205, for payment for five hundred Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 14. Did you indorse this check?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you receive the money on it?
A. I think my chief clerk may have received it.
Q. Please refer to your book, September 7, or any time after that, and see if this check is to be found there.
A. I do not see it here.
Q. I hold in my hand a paper reading as follows: "Office Congressional Printer, Washington, D. C., September 14, 1875. Received from Solomons & Chapman $60, deposit on account of printing and binding seventy-five copies of the Morse Memorial; should the work not amount to $60, the excess to be returned. (Signed) H. H. Clapp, chief clerk." Is that an official document from your office?
A. It is.
Q. Was that amount of money received on that day?
A. As appears on a package in the safe, it is there now.
Q. Is it entered on your cash-book?
A. It is not, sir.

I now introduce H. H. Clapp, chief clerk and book-keeper of the Congressional Printer, to tell his story as to the modus operandi of keeping accounts at the Government Printing Office. Comment is needless. Money is acknowledged to have been received and not accounted for:

Question. Are the entries for cash, received from the catalogues of the Library of Congress, in your handwriting?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Where has the amount received of Weinberger, June 24, $8.20, been accounted for by you?
A. I do not see it here.
Q. Where has the amount noted as received from the Free Public Library of Worcester, $14, November 21, been accounted for?
A. I do not see that here, either.
Q. Do the entries in cash-book No. 1 always show the day on which money was received?
A. I think they do.
Q. Look at pages 2, 19, 20, and 24, and explain the irregularities as to dates?
A. I cannot explain that now.
Q. Were the orders noted in the front part of the cash-book No. 1 for public documents, &c., actually filled, if not marked to the contrary?
A. I suppose so, but I don't know.

Q. State whether the amount realized from such orders, or from the sale of documents, should appear in the cash-book.
A. Yes, it should.
Q. Show where the amounts received from Dr. Englemann and S. Watson, noted on cash-book No. 1, page 14, appear.
A. I don't think they have been paid. I see they are not marked paid.
Q. Do you know whether they have paid or not?
A. I think they have not.
Q. By whose authority did these men receive documents and not pay for them?
A. I don't know if they have ever received them.
Q. What does your book show?
A. The book would show that they had.
Q. If the book shows that they had received them, by what right were they given to them without the money?
A. I cannot answer that question satisfactorily.
Q. Have all the moneys received by you from sales of documents been accounted for on the cash-book?
A. No, sir; I know there must be some mistake on the books, because when I made up my cash after the books were turned over to you, I had $87 and something over in cash, and it has been over for some time, and I have been trying to find where the error was.
Q. State what balance remains in your hands, say to the 10th of March, 1876, from the sale of documents, &c.
A. About $3,644.26.
Q. You have stated that you have a surplus of $87; how do you explain an additional surplus of about $200, as appears by a correct addition of the figures on the first page of the cash-book?
A. I cannot explain that.
Q. Can you make any explanation of the additional surplus by correctly adding page 9 of the cash-book?
A. No, sir.
Q. I discover another similar error on page 10, cash-book No. 2; have you any explanation in regard to that?
A. I suppose I have made my footing wrong.
Q. Those errors amount to $206.40; will you show where your cash-book takes up this amount of surplus?
A. No, sir.
Q. Why did you fail to correct those errors?
A. I cannot for my life see how I could make a mistake as to the first one; the other two are very easy to make.
Q. I hand you Exhibit DD, and receipt of Mr. Buchecker, dated October 6, 1873, for binding one volume, $3; is that receipt in your handwriting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Please examine your books and see if there is any entry showing the receipt of that money from Mr. Buchecker?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you keep the books at that time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What explanation do you give of the non-appearance of that money?
A. I cannot give any. It is not here.
Q. I wish you to examine your book of accounts showing the work done for the special session of the Senate, Forty-third Congress, and tell me if a charge appears there for printing Executive Document No. 2.
A. It does not.
Q. Why was it omitted?
A. I do not know that it was ever printed.
Q. Here is the document.
A. It was never put on my desk, and therefore I omitted it.
Q. With this document omitted, does your book show a correct exhibit of the work done, or does the Congressional Printer's report show a correct exhibit of the work done?
A. No, sir; not for that session.
Q. The Morrisons having received five hundred copies of volumes 5, 6, 8, 9, two thousand copies in all, what is the value of them?
A. Something like $1,000.
Q. And your books show no entry of the delivery of those books and no cash receipts for the same?
A. I suppose the receipt-book would show for the delivery of all of them. There is no book shows that any cash has been received.
Q. Then there is due to the Government Printing Office something like $1,000 for the reports sold and delivered to Morrison for which there has either been no payment, or, if paid, no entry has been made?
A. Yes, sir.

The next witness I will introduce shall be W. H. Collins, clerk in charge of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD accounts. He is a novelty in book-keeping, and exhibits rare talents in forcing balances when his cash received and disbursements do not agree. He is equal to any emergency, however, and has proven himself to be an accountant whose genius is not to be trammeled by arithmetical rules or truth-telling figures. Let him tell his own story:

Question. Are you in the habit of keeping money which comes into your hands in the early part of the year until the end of the year before passing it into the hands of the financial clerk?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Will you tell me, when you made your settlement last year with the financial clerk, what amount you had in that box?
A. I think in the neighborhood of $50.
Q. Then you have made other errors besides the $20 in the keeping of your cash account?
A. I must have done so.
Q. Who has access to the cash-box except yourself?
A. No one.
Q. How often do you make entries in your cash-book?
A. Every day.
Q. You enter cash as you receive it every day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How would it be possible for you to omit this and make your cash at night agree with your entries that day?
A. I do not keep the cash of each day separate.
Q. It is not possible for you to tell whether you have been robbed of $100 or any other amount during the session?
A. No, sir.
Q. You tell me that as a book-keeper?
A. Yes, sir; that is the way we have been doing it.

By Mr. BALLOU:

Q. Do you only once a session count up your cash and compare it with your cash-book?
A. That is all.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you mean by that once a year?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr BALLOU:

Q. At any particular time?
A. No, sir.
Q. After you have settled up, what do you do with the money?
A. I turn it over to the financial clerk of the office. I turned it over to him twice before the end of last year.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. Does that receipt (referring to Mr. Larcombe's receipt in the cash-book) show the true state of the case?
A. It shows the amount of money he received; but he did not receipt it all that day.
Q. Then the receipt does not import verity on its face?
A. No; but it is meant to.
Q. In what book do you keep the several amounts you pay him from time to time?
A. I have no book.
Q. How do you manage to keep all those things without a record?
A. I kept it on a memorandum. I took no receipt. I simply made memoranda.
Q. You only took his general receipt at the end of the year?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Will the finance clerk's books show the time when you paid him the money?
A. I do not think they will.
Q. Where are the books kept showing the amount of the binding materials and the quality used in the RECORD?
A. My books should have shown that, but I have not put it on there.
Q. Where is it?
A. I have them all.
Q. In what sort of shape?
A. On memoranda.
Q. Do you keep an account of the binding material used for the RECORD, reaching about $20,000 for a short session?
A. (Handing paper, Exhibit BB.) This is the report made to me.
Q. Is this single half-sheet of letter-paper, written on one side, which I hold in my hand, the only data furnished you on which to make entries on the book?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When was this furnished to you?
A. At the end of Congress.
Q. Who furnished you this paper?
A. Mr. Roberts. Mr Roberts first furnished me a report the same as this with the exception of the price paid per foot for leather. I found when I came to make out the report that he had used more leather at twenty-four cents a foot than had been bought, which could not have been possible. Then he made up another report.
Q. How did he remedy the error?
A. I got him to rectify it. I took out all the amount which had been purchased at twenty-two cents.

I dismiss Mr. Collins and introduce another of the clerks of said establishment, who is also foreman of printing, H. T. Brian, who being examined in reference to his department answers as follows:

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Question. How is it possible, then, for Congress to judge of the correctness of work done in the Congressional Printing Office if you lump your charges, as you have stated you do?
Answer. We lump them on one job; we would not lump that job with something else.
Q. Is this the only job you do where you lump the charges?
A. We charge the work at sixty cents. What we lose on the lean we gain on the fat.
Q. Do your books, then, show in any instance the cost and detailed statement of any job of work done in that office?
A. They will show the approximate cost.
Q. Could any expert in book-keeping take the books kept in the Congressional Printing Office and figure out under each head what any job of work has cost?
A. He could not on one job; he could on the whole.
Q. What do you mean by "he could on the whole?"
A. On the whole amount of work done.
Q. Where errors have been made in the cost of composition, or binding, or any other item going to make up the expenses, could any expert tell when and how those errors have occurred?
A. I don't believe he could.
Q. Don't you know he could not?
A. I don't believe he could.
Q. In regard to the charges for the press-work, don't the books of the Congressional Printing Office show that charges have been made for more press-work than has absolutely been done in the office?
A. The books show press-work on every job. The fact is, we combine the jobs where they can be combined.
Q. When you combine them and make but one impression, turning out eight separate jobs, do you not find the press-work charged eight times on that particular job?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do or do not these books convey a false impression by their charges on press-work?
A. Yes; I believe they do.
Q. Is there any more labor in making an impression where you have combined eight forms of one page each than there is if you had but a single form?
A. No, sir.

I next read from the testimony of the financial clerk, John Larcombe, sharp, oily-tongued, and unscrupulous. He needed but a few hours to improvise a cash-book which would balance all accounts of money received and money disbursed, and yet leave his employer, A. M. Clapp, according to his own testimony, the neat little sum of $58,000 as his perquisites:

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Question. Who keeps the waste-paper account-books?
Answer. I do.
Q. Will you please show, from your book or books, where an accumulation of more than $50,000 has been made?
A. I will show from this paper before me. [Exhibit EE.]
Q. Is there any entry in any book in your office showing an accumulation of upward of $50,000 from sale of waste, imperfections, &c.?
A. Not in any book.

Q. Examine your cash-book and state if the entries contained therein account for moneys as they were received from day to day?

A. Every day on which moneys were received. There is not a falsehood in any one figure.

Q. State how long this cash-book has been used by you.

A. Since the creation of that office.

Q. Were the entries contained therein made by you on the day when you received the money?

A. In every case, with one single exception.

Q. How can you account for the irregularity with which entries follow each other without regard to dates? I refer you to pages 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9.

A. The memorandum from which these entries were made was a perfect record as to dates, names, for what object, and amount, but in depositing the moneys in the Treasury, until recently, they were deposited to the credit of printing or binding, as the case may have been.

* * * * * * *

Q. This book then was made up from memoranda?

A. The book was made up from a statement of facts as they existed at the time, whenever a deposit was made in the Treasury.

Q. Instead of this book being a book of original entry, has it not, in truth and in fact, been made up from other books, and almost all the writing in it put on it in one sitting?

A. That book is a perfect and exact copy of the same information, as far as it goes, taken from other books in which it was first kept, because of the fact that there were other things in that book, and I thought that that book ought to be kept separate.

Q. It is not, therefore, a book of original entry?

A. It is not.

Q. Have you any book of original entry of receipts from sales of waste, imperfections, &c.

A. No.

Q. Were the contents of those loose sheets of paper which show an accumulation of about $50,000 copied from other slips of paper?

A. A portion of it was and a portion is original entries.

Q. Was not, in truth and in fact, this paper copied at one time and at one sitting?

A. It was not.

Q. How much was copied?

A. The greater portion of it.

Q. Where is the book, then, which shows the amounts of receipt of money?

A. This book, as far as it goes, with this paper added, shows it down to the 10th of March.

Q. So, then, this book as far as copied from the other one, only shows the deposits made in the Treasury, and does not show the amount of cash which has been received from time to time?

A. That is right.

Q. You have no book, then, in your possession other than the one now before us, labeled "Summary Cash-book," and have never had any book since you have been in the position which you now occupy, which shows the amount of cash which has come into your hands?

A. No, sir; I have no other book.

Q. Do you not, in fact, arbitrarily make up the amount you put in the Treasury, and after making up this amount make entries to correspond, in that summary cash-book?

A. Yes, sir; of course.

Q. Does the book marked "Summary Cash-book" show the full and true amounts which have been received from year to year?

A. No, sir; it does not.

Q. When, therefore, you have put certain amounts into the Treasury, have you not retained from year to year large amounts of cash which have been received by the Congressional Printer from shavings, imperfections, &c., in the Government Printing Office?

A. Not in every instance; generally so; there have been periods when the very last dollar in the possession of the office has been paid into the Treasury.

Q. Has there been any time since Mr. Clapp has been the Congressional Printer, when you have paid into the Treasury the full amount of cash which you received?

A. Not since Mr. Clapp has had charge.

Q. Is there any evidence in this cash-book to show that you have a surplus on hand?

A. No, sir.

Q. Does it not, on the contrary, convey the impression that everything is squared up to the respective dates?

A. I cannot answer that in the affirmative, because I know the contrary is the intention.

Q. Have you not balanced your books from time to time, which would indicate that you have received just so much money and paid that amount over to the Treasury, and that there was no balance remaining in your hands?

A. No, sir; my books do not pretend to indicate that.

Q. The book is before you; show me on any page of it, since Mr. Clapp has been in the office, an entry indicating that there was still a balance in your hands.

A. There is no such entry.

Q. Have you any evidence, other than the slip marked "Exhibit EE," whereby you can determine, or any one else can ascertain, what amount of public funds the Congressional Printer has in his hands?

A. None.

Q. Had the sheet of paper or memorandum on which you have kept the amount of money received from year to year been lost or misplaced, could you have made any proper showing of the amount of money due to the Government from that establishment?

A. No, sir.

Q. Please examine the book which is marked "Summary Cash-book," and answer the question why it is that you have kept the money which finally you have deposited from time to time in the Treasury, most of it for twelve months and much of it for two years after it has been received?

A. Because those moneys had been retained for that purpose.

Q. You have retained those several amounts, besides other large amounts which you say the books do not show as coming to your hands, all for the purpose of paying hands?

A. Whatever moneys have been received have been withheld for that purpose.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In a regular system of book-keeping, where moneys may be retained at will, is it not customary in a book like your summary cash-book to enter on the debit side every transaction which brings money into the fund from waste-paper, shavings, imperfections, &c., while all deposits in the Treasury are entered on the credit side, so that the difference between the two amounts would show the balance in your hands at any time?

A. I have no doubt of it.

Q. Why, then, do you not keep your book in that way?

A. In the first place, I did this for the very reason that if anybody would want to look at this matter they could see this matter as it occurred.

Q. But have you not, in truth and in fact, concealed this transaction from any one who examines your books?

A. I do not see how it is concealed.

Q. You have admitted that the book does not show the amount you have on hand. The system which I have indicated would show that amount. This book shows the amount you have paid into the Treasury; therefore, this being the case, why have you kept the information out of the book?

A. Because, in my judgment, this method would be a very convenient one for referring to the transactions.

The last witness who testified in relation to the book-keeping is Charles E. Behle, an expert, who spent many days in his efforts of find some key which would unlock the door and reveal the arcana to our Government Printing Office.

Hear what Mr. Behle says:

Question. Is it possible to keep the books of the Government Printing Office in such a manner as to exhibit clear results as to the cost of the work executed there, the quantity and cost of the materials purchased, the quantity and cost of those consumed, and the quantity and cost of those remaining on hand?

Answer. It is. They ought to be so kept, in order to guard against all losses, and to conduct the business in such way that at any and all times the transactions of the Office should appear; and to guard the Government against losses, fraud, &c.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. From the thorough examination of the books which have come under your eye and the manner in which they have been kept, is it possible to guard against frauds and losses if this system of book-keeping continues?

A. It is not; on the contrary, I should say that the doors would be wide open to fraud with dishonest officials.

Q. Taking into consideration the way the books have been kept and the office of the Congressional Printer managed, as shown by the books, could any individual or corporation pursue the same system and hope to escape bankruptcy?

A. I should say that under this system of book-keeping an individual or corporation, being constantly at sea as to the actual state of his business affairs, it necessarily might involve him in bankruptcy.

Q. From your examination of these books, compared with the reports of the Congressional Printer, do you consider them as in any sense reliable?

A. I do not from actual examination of the books before me; I should say that they were not reliable; they are unreliable.

Theodore De Vinne, as to management of office and payment of hands:

Question. What hours are required of, and what wages are paid to, printers in the Congressional Printing-Office in this city?

Answer. I am informed and believe that they are paid $24 a week for a day of eight hours, and sixty cents a thousand when they work by the piece.

Q. How much higher, then, are wages in this city than in New York?

A. Fifty per cent.

Q. In the book-offices of New York and in the job-offices that do book and pamphlet work, how are men employed—by the week or by the thousand ems?

A. By the thousand ems, excepting the very few men who are employed as makers-up, readers, and foremen. Nine-tenths of the men employed work by the piece.

Q. If the average New York compositor did this work on time, what would be his daily performance and his earnings?

A. His performance would be one-fifth more; his earnings $3.33.

Q. He would set, therefore, about three and three-fourths pages a day of ten hours, for which he would be paid $3.33?

A. Yes, sir; he would be paid $3.33, and he would do a fifth more than the same man would do here at eight hours.

Q. Do you know any office in the country, excepting the Government Printing Office, in which book and pamphlet compositors are paid by the day?

A. I do not.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. You have examined a good deal of the printing done in the Government Printing Office?

A. I have, sir.

Q. From the examination which you have given the printing done by the Government Printing Office for the various Departments and the comparison of the total cost of such printing with the cost of like printing done by other offices in New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, are you prepared to say whether the printing done in the Congressional Printing Office costs more than printing of like character done elsewhere?

A. It does cost more.

Q. Please state about the per cent. of additional cost.

A. I have never formulated it in my mind, but I can make this answer, that the returns, as I have examined them, show very clearly that labor costs one-half more here than it does in northern cities. It is shown in the charges, or, in other words, the cost is about one-half greater.

Q. Upon an examination of the facilities for printing connected with the Government establishment, as you find them at present, is there any good reason why the Government printing should cost 50 per cent. more than printing of the same sort elsewhere?

A. There is no reason but the high price of labor.

Q. Can you account for the Government paying sixty cents per thousand ems, while equally as skillful labor is employed in the city of Washington, in outside or private establishments, at fifty cents a thousand?

A. No, I do not see why the rule which applies to one should not apply to the other.

Q. If the Government Printing Office were conducted upon the same principles that govern the conduct and management of a private establishment, ought not work to be done cheaper there than in a private establishment?

A. I think it could be done cheaper; that is, provided it did not attempt a great variety of work.

By Mr. BALLOU:

Q. Do you not think that the Government can control the price of labor as well as individuals could control it?

A. I do.

Q. Then the only thing required in order to have it done cheaper in the Government Printing Office than it can be done by private parties is to have the office well managed?

A. It needs some discretion in the selection of work, as well as economical management.

The testimony of John G. Judd, Daniel P. Steele, Joseph L. Pearson, John R. Edwards, L. A. Lipman, and Grafton Johnson, all practical men, successfully engaged in business, corroborates Mr. De Vinne in the statements he made, while it leaves no room to doubt the grossest extravagance in the administration of the Public Printing Office. These gentlemen, summoned as experts before your committee, are men of high standing in their vocation, and by no means envious or desirous of Government work. In fact most of them, when asked, distinctly stated that they are not now, nor do they expect to be in the future, applicants for Government patronage. The charge, therefore, that these gentlemen did what they did from envy, or prompted by any other motive than that of telling the truth, rests upon no foundation in fact other than the simple assertion of the minority of this committee, unsustained by the testimony.

I next propose to show the reckless and criminal manner in which purchases of materials for the Government Printing Office have been made; the enormous losses which have occurred to the Government in this way, for which Clapp and his securities should be made responsible to the extent of the penalty of their bond. I have a copy of said bond before me, which is executed in a penalty of $80,000, payable to the United States, and contains the following among other provisions:

Now, therefore, the condition of the foregoing obligation is such that if the said Almon M. Clapp has truly and faithfully executed and discharged and shall continue truly and faithfully to execute and discharge all the duties of said office according to law then the above obligation to be void and of none effect, otherwise it shall abide and remain in full force and effect.

A. M. Clapp testifies as follows:

Question. In making purchases in open market do you endeavor, by inquiry or otherwise, to arrive at the lowest prices?

Answer. I have always done that. I have tried to get at the bottom of the market.

Note this answer, and compare it with others made almost immediately after:

Q. Do you know whether or not you could have made these purchases for a less amount of money if you had gone directly to the manufacturers?

A. I cannot answer that.

Q. Have you made any inquiries?

A. Only through my foreman.

Q. Have you ever made any effort to ascertain, outside of the information you received from your foreman, as to the manner, and mode, and place of purchase, and the amount?

A. No, sir.

Q. Have you ever advertised for proposals for articles which you are required to purchase?

A. No.

Q. Have you ever taken steps by issuing circulars, or giving information that you needed them, that you could make good rates, considering the number you purchase?

A. I have not.

Q. Have you ever visited the manufacturers or had any one else do so?

A. No.

Mr. Clapp stated above that his purchases of materials were made through J. H. Roberts, foreman of the bindery, and that said foreman sought to buy them at "bottom prices." In denial of this assertion, let Mr. Roberts speak for himself:

Question. Has the Congressional Printer acted under your advice in making purchases of binding materials?

Answer. Not at first; but lately he has.

Q. Who made the original purchases from Campbell & Armstrong?

A. Mr. Clapp gave the order to purchase from Campbell & Armstrong. I gave the official order on Mr. Clapp as usual, and he directed where it should go.

Q. About what amount of binding materials do you purchase per year?

A. I cannot answer that.

Q. Does it reach about $175,000 a year?

A. In that neighborhood.

Q. Have you made efforts to purchase those materials by inquiry of and correspondence with manufacturers, so as to get the bottom prices?

A. I have never made much effort on that score. * * *

I now offer extracts from the testimony of dealers in the articles purchased by the Congressional Printer, showing to some extent the losses to the Government by his neglect of duty:

B. C. DORSEY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In what business are you engaged?

Answer. The paper business.

Q. Where are you located?

A. Nos. 33 and 35 South Charles street, Baltimore.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that business?

A. I went into that business in 1844. I may say I have been a practical paper-dealer twenty-five years.

Q. Are you familiar with the various kinds of paper used in the Government Printing Office?

A. I think I am, sir.

Q. Have you made an examination of the last report of the Congressional Printer?

A. I have, sir.

Q. Have you examined page 30 of said report, under the head of "Ledger and other papers purchased in open market?"

A. I have, sir.

John R. Edwards, practical binder, of Baltimore, after examining prices reported by Congressional Printer as paid for a bill of articles, testifies as follows:

Question. Will you now state the total cost as reported by the Congressional Printer of the samples upon which I have examined you?

Answer. Eighteen hundred and twenty-four dollars and seventy cents.

Q. And for what sum would you furnish the entire number?

A. Eight hundred and twenty-two dollars and forty-eight cents.

Q. Leaving a difference of how much?

A. One thousand and two dollars and twenty-two cents.

Q. About what per cent. of overcharge is this?

A. I should say it was about 125 per cent.

Q. Please state to the committee what it cost you to furnish this kind of work upon which you have been examined.

A. The cost would be $654.66.

Q. Leaving a percentage of difference between your cost and the cost as reported by the Congressional Printer?

A. About 300 per cent. more than mine.

Q. In making your estimates have you included everything?

A. Everything, sir.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. Would you consider it fair to the Government that such prices should be paid as the Congressional Printer paid for the materials which you have spoken of without first submitting the same to competition?

A. No, sir; there is no individual binder in the country that would pay those prices.

Q. Have you ever known of an opportunity being afforded by the Congressional Printer to dealers in binders' materials to compete for the articles which you have mentioned?

A. No, sir; I have not.

Daniel P. Steele, a practical binder, who served a regular apprenticeship, and for thirty years has been engaged in the business both as journeyman and manager, says:

Question. From your examination of the Congressional Printer's report, what say you as to the per cent. overpaid for binders' materials?

Answer. As an average of the entire purchases, I find that the excess is all the way from 30, 35, to 40 per cent. in excess of retail prices.

George A. Gane, being a large dealer in binding materials, gives his testimony as follows:

Question. Did you, at the time you called upon Mr. Clapp, present a schedule of materials with the prices at which you would furnish them?

Answer. I did not.

Q. At what time, or about what time, was this first visit made to Mr. Clapp?

A. I should say about a year before we presented the schedule.

Q. Did you, at the time you called upon him, make a statement to him or let him know, in any way, that you could furnish goods cheaper than he had been getting them?

A. I did. The simple remark was made that we could furnish him goods to better advantage than he was buying them.

Q. He told you that he would look into it?

A. He did.

Q. Did he look into the matter, or did you hear from him at that time?

A. No, sir; not at that time.

Q. Did you ever afterward make an attempt to secure any of the business of the Government Printing Office?

A. We did.

Q. State when you made the second application and all about it?

A. In January, 1875, we made extracts from the Printer's report of the previous year, showing what he had paid for binding material during that year, and against the said prices we placed the figures at which we would be willing to furnish the goods. We were, as I said before, only able to bid against some of the prices of which we had definite knowledge as to what the goods were, other goods being stated without anything in relation to sizes or qualities, simply giving the quantity and the prices paid, so that there was no chance to bid on them.

Q. State the amount and kinds of goods embraced in the schedule you speak of in round numbers.

A. The value of goods purchased in 1874, for which we made proposals to furnish them in 1875, would be about $140,000. The following schedule will cover the kinds or varieties of goods: Binders' cloth, imitation Russia cow-hide, raw-sheep, raw-calf, roans, parchment, gold-leaf, twine, marble-paper, albumen, supers, and binders' boards. The saving to the Government, had we furnished the goods at the prices given in our schedule, would have been about $16,000 on the above-mentioned sum.

Henry Franz, having listened to the testimony of Mr. Gane, fully confirms his statements. He says:

A. I did hear the testimony, and I think it is correct, to the best of my knowledge and belief, regarding the quality of goods, prices, &c.

George W. Garner, a member of the firm of John Campbell & Co., which house has been furnishing materials to the Congressional Printer for seven years, gives the following testimony:

Question. How long has your house, or the house that you are now connected with, furnished goods to the Government Printing Office?

Answer. About seven years.

Q. What is the present amount of business done by the house?

A. About $300,000.

Q. About what amount of goods do you annually furnish to the Government Printer?

A. I would say from $125,000 to $150,000—say about $150,000; last year it was considerably less than the year before.

Q. Referring to your books of account, I find a bill to Mr. Clapp under date February 28, 1874; is it possible, by an examination of this book, to arrive at the quality of goods furnished in that bill without your personal explanation accompanying it?

Mr. SINGLETON. From the book itself, if it were put in the hands of a stranger?

A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Consequently, taking all the data you have, it is impossible to arrive at the quality of goods furnished, without you are put upon the stand and questioned in regard to them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I find you purchased $879.75 worth of imitation gold-leaf, and you sold it to the Government at a profit of $570.25?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do I understand you to say that on an investment of $879.25 you realized a profit of $570.25?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is Mr. Valleau's establishment?

A. In New York City.

Q. Do your books show that every time you received an order from the Congressional Printer you purchased from Valleau just the amount ordered by the Congressional Printer during the past two years?

A. With one exception, to my knowledge, they do.

Q. Were the purchases made before the reception or after the reception of the order of Mr. Clapp?

A. Occasionally before.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. Did Mr. Clapp know that you bought those materials from Valleau?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Does not the gold-leaf show from what house it comes?

A. Yes.

Q. Could he fail to know from what house it came?

A. Of course I do not know; every pack is stamped with Valleau's name.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is this paper which I hand you a correct exhibit from your bills and vouchers of the profits made on various sales?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. On one sale of $4,452 of law-calf did you realize a profit of $1,264?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What profit per dozen have you made on law-calf sold to the Government?
A. Six, and perhaps eight, dollars per dozen.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. In the matter of gold leaf, what amount do you keep on hand outside of what you sell to the Government?
A. We keep a small stock. Things we can supply we do not keep on hand, but buy from manufacturers.
Q. Is not this the case in most of the materials you sell to the Congressional Printer, so far as the value of them is concerned?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In the articles which you sell to the Congressional Printer, what proportion of them do you buy from the manufacturers after you receive orders from the Printer?
A. About two-thirds.
Q. What proportion of the goods you sell to the Congressional Printer have you manufactured heretofore?
A. None.
Q. You say that you have charged the Government higher prices in some cases. Please state on what articles.
A. I cannot remember any particular articles.
Q. How, then, can you say, if you do not recoll ct any particular article, that you have charged higher prices than you have charged private individuals in some instances?
A. By the general prices.
Q. By the general prices on what articles?
A. Cowhide, cloth, sheep, gold-leaf, calf; that is all, I believe.
Q. Do not those articles cover a majority in value of the articles sold to the Government?
A. Yes, sir.

Interesting as it may be to follow up the devious ways and malpractices of the Congressional Printer and his confrères in the sales and purchases of materials for the Government Printing Office, I must close up this point. I think enough has been disclosed to carry conviction to every unbiased mind that there has been collusion between these parties to defraud the Government and enrich themselves at the expense of virtuous manhood and every principle of honest and fair dealing. What wonder that the house of John Campbell & Co. has waxed fat, after feeding so luxuriously from the "public crib," buying $879.75 worth of imitation gold-leaf, and selling it at a profit of $570.25, not advancing one cent, but paying with the money drawn from the Treasury upon a voucher furnished by them to A. M. Clapp? What wonder that this house should be able to double its capital in a few years, when on a sale of $4,452 of calfskin to the Government it should be able to realize a profit of $1,264, and never wake a sleeping penny that was resting in their pockets? What wonder that A. M. Clapp should be the possessor of houses and lots in Washington, the owner of bank stock and bank deposits, aggregating many tens of thousands of dollars, when it is understood that he came to this city a bankrupt?

I ask for a short time the attention of the House while I lay before it a gross violation of the criminal law of the land by imposing upon the Secretary of the Treasury a false voucher in the settlement of his accounts.

A. M. Clapp's testimony:

Question. Referring to the stubs of your check-book, under the date of March 13, 1872, do you find that a check was drawn in favor of Philp & Solomons for $234?
Answer. I do.
Q. Can you explain for what that check was drawn?
A. I cannot here say.
Q. Do the data you have show that fifty reams of white cap paper were purchased from Philp & Solomons on February 20, 1872?
A. Yes; and receipted for by my foreman of binding.
Q. It shows that you purchased paper from Philp & Solomons?
A. Yes, sir.

A. S. Solomons testifies to the fact that not one sheet of such paper was purchased from him by the Congressional Printer, but that a false voucher was made out for the benefit of Mr. Clapp, and used in his settlement with the Treasury.

Question. Did you make an examination in regard to the transaction of March 13, 1872, when the Congressional Printer drew a check in favor of Philp & Solomons for $234?
Answer. I did.
Q. Please state the result of that examination.
A. We had a large number of blank books which we desired to sell to the Treasury Department. They needed the books but had no fund out of which they could pay for them, and suggested that we should see some one connected with the Public Printer. I met Mr. Roberts, whom I believed to be the foreman of the bindery, and related to him the circumstances. He said he would see about it. Shortly thereafter he made inquiry as to the number of books in our possession, and subsequently saw and made a selection from them, footing up the amount we asked for such books. He then informed me that under the law they could not buy blank-books, but had to buy paper, and he asked me to make out the bill for the gross amount of the books, that was $234. The bill read, "Fifty reams white cap paper, 18 pounds, at 26 cents per pound, $4.68 per ream," making, in the aggregate, $234. Subsequently that amount was paid to us by a check from the Government Printer, and the account was closed.
Q. How many books did you sell them?
A. Somewhere between one hundred and twenty-five and two hundred demy and crown cloth-covered books, ruled faint only, and paged.
Q. Did you include in this charge paper, books, binding, and all else connected?
A. Yes.
Q. In this bill of $234 did you furnish any white cap paper?
A. None whatever.

J. H. Roberts, foreman of binding, through whom the blank-books were purchased, fixes the responsibility upon the Congressional Printer, where it properly belongs, although the Printer feigns utter ignorance of the whole transaction.

Question. Did you ever make a purchase of Philp & Solomons of books, and have them make out a bill for the same as paper?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Was Mr. Clapp conversant with that transaction in its various stages?
A. I cannot say that. I presume I reported to him when I came back.
Q. Did he know that you were requested to, or proposed to, get this property from Philp & Solomons?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he acquiesce in it?
A. He told me to buy the books if I thought it to the advantage of the Government.
Q. Did Mr. Solomons make out a bill for fifty reams of white cap paper, amounting to $234, and did you make a requisition on the Congressional Printer for fifty reams of white cap and acknowledge the receipt of the same?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you receive from Philp & Solomons?
A. I received three different kinds of books.

John Larcombe, the cash-book-maker and voucher-manufacturer, tells how and why it was done:

Question. Please examine the check which I hand you. * * * Did you fill up the body of that check?
Answer. That check was filled up by me and that check was paid by me.
Q. By whose authority and under whose instructions was this check drawn?
A. By authority of the Congressional Printer.

But, Mr. Speaker, I come now to the very gist of the whole transaction. The admissions of the Congressional Printer, with abundant testimony outside, show that in violation of law he has retained in his hands for years and still retains some $60,000 of money of the United States, which it was his duty to have covered into the Treasury as fast as it accumulated. I invoke a careful consideration of this point by the House, as it is the most important one.

A. M. Clapp testifies:

Question. Have you now a large amount of money in your hands or on deposit belonging to the Government of the United States?
Answer. I have.
Q. State what amount.
A. I think somewhere in the vicinity of $50,000.
Q. How long have you had this money in your hands, or a portion of it?
A. It has been accumulating along.
Q. Does it reach back to the beginning of your administration?
A. Not entirely back.
Q. Have you any authority of law for using this money in any other way than to cover it into the Treasury?
A. I only pay the Government employés.
Q. Have you a right so to use it under the law?
A. I judge so.
Q. Is there not an annual appropriation made by Congress for the purpose of paying the employés?
A. Yes; but the Government Printer can only draw $53,000 at a time, and the pay-roll amounts to over $80,000.
Q. You now hold in your hands $50,000 belonging to the United States Government?
A. I think I have.

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Q. Please state the amount of money you now have on deposit in your safe belonging to the Government accumulating from the sale of documents, waste, &c.
A. Somewhere in the vicinity of $50,000.
Q. Will you permit the clerk of this committee, Mr. Wiener, to go to your office and, in your presence, count the money?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you no deposit in any bank in the city?
A. No, sir.

Charles J. Wiener, the clerk of this committee, having made count of the moneys on hand, says:

I was instructed to proceed to the office of the Congressional Printer, with him, in order to make count of all moneys belonging to the Government, and which were included in what Mr. Clapp calls a surplus fund. When I reached the office Mr. Clapp introduced me to Mr. Larcombe, the financial clerk, and left me with him. Mr. Larcombe expressed his regret, first, that I had called at so late an hour in the day; second, that I had called at a very inopportune moment, since all of the money was not on hand at that time; he proceeded to say that the Congressional Printer, or rather the officer in charge, does not pretend to have all that money in cash. I counted the sum in the safe and found that it amounted to $16,257.99. Mr. Larcombe counted the amount as soon as I was through, and our accounts tallied, all but one cent, he making it ninety-eight cents and I ninety-nine.

In the testimony in the case here given, it will be seen from the statements of Charles Wiener and J. A. Ruff that Clapp has made two gross misstatements: first, that he had in his safe $50,000 when, in fact, there was but $16,257.99, and, secondly, that he had no deposits in any bank in this city, when at that moment he had deposited $12,000 in the Metropolis Savings Bank and $1,800 in the Second National Bank.

J. A. Ruff, cashier of the Metropolis Savings Bank, states:

Question. Do you receive money on deposit and pay interest on deposits?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Does Mr. A. M. Clapp do business with your bank?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What amount of money has he on deposit in your bank?
A. I think about $12,000. On March 11, A. M. Clapp deposited $12,641.05, and on the same day he made a check for $300. On March 29 he made a check for $46.81.
Q. Is this deposit of Mr. Clapp's a time-deposit or subject to draft?
A. Subject to sight-drafts. All our deposits are.
Q. What is your rule in regard to allowing interest on deposits?
A. We do it by the calendar month. Money paid in to-day commences interest on the 1st May. We allow interest on the minimum balance for the current month.
Q. What rate of interest do you pay?
A. Five per cent. per annum.

H. C. Swain, cashier of Second National Bank, bears testimony to the falsity of the statement that Clapp had no bank deposits.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Are you cashier of the Second National Bank of Washington?
Answer. I am.
Q. Is A. M. Clapp, the Congressional Printer, a stockholder in your bank and does he do business with your bank?

A. He is a stockholder and does business as an individual there.
Q. What amount does he hold?
A. Fifteen shares, amounting to $1,500.
Q. Has Mr. Clapp, at any time since your connection with the bank, had a large amount of money deposited?
A. He has had a balance in bank since I have been there—a balance of about $8,000.
Q. After examination of the books, what amount, at any one time, or at various times, did Mr. Clapp have on deposit before you became cashier?
A. Not exceeding $15,000 or $16,000 at any one time.
Q. Has your bank been in the habit of allowing interest on deposits?
A. In certain cases by arrangments, when the money remains some length of time.
Q. Has your bank at any time allowed interest on deposits?
A. It has.
Q. Did Mr. Clapp receive interest on the $16,000, which you say he had on deposit, at any time?
A. That came from the average of accounts.
Q. What amount of money has been paid to Mr. Clapp for interest on deposits since the organization of the bank?
A. Nine hundred and eighty dollars.
Q. What amount has he now on deposit?
A. Not exceeding $1,800.

By Mr. BALLOU:

Q. What would be the average of Mr. Clapp's deposit since he has had an account at the bank.
A. About $8,200.

John Larcombe again appears, and admits that there is in his hands, as financial clerk, or ought to be, $56,382.07, exclusive of $4,855.90 accumulated since 19th November, 1875, thus corroborating the statement of C. E. Behle, an expert, who examined the books, and testified in relation to them:

Question. State, from the cash-book before you, the amount of money on hand from all amounts realized from the sale of shavings, documents, &c., to the 10th of March, 1876?
Answer. The book before me does not show that fact. It is on a detached sheet. If I have made no error, the amount is $56,382.07.
Q. Does this amount include all receipts to March 10, 1876?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where are the receipts from the sale of documents, &c., from November 19, 1875, to March 10, 1876, accounted for, as shown by the cash-book to amount to $3,644.26, inclusive of balance of $1,211.64 from September 30, 1875?
A. I do not know where they are.
Q. Why was the amount of $3,644.26 omitted in the statement on the loose sheets?
A. For the simple reason that I had never seen or heard of it.
Q. Why were those moneys not deposited monthly, as the law directs?
A. I never heard of such a law.
Q. Why was this money not deposited monthly as it was received?
A. Because, in the absence of any law to the contrary, the exigencies of the office required it.

I now read from the testimony of C. E. Behle, a very skillful accountant, who, before another committee of this House, demonstrated his thorough ability to sift and digest the most complicated system of book-keeping, and who spent days in trying to comprehend the affairs of this office, says:

Question. Do the amounts stated in the reports as realized (from sales of waste, &c.,) agree with the book-entries?
Answer. They do not.
Q. Should, or should not, the books sustain the reports?
A. By all means, the books should corroborate the statements of the reports.
Q. From your examination, state the amounts deposited from October 1, 1875, to March 10, 1876?
A. There are two deposits on October 12 of $9,137.38; and on November 12, $10,889.93.
Q. What balance, then, would this show to be on hand on the 10th of March?
A. The amount realized from October 1, 1875, to February 18, 1876, as shown by loose sheets accompanying summary cash-book, was $12,580.50; with the balance on hand not deposited on September 30, $63,828.88, and the balance as shown by cash-book from H. H. Clapp, from October 4, 1875, to March 10, 1876, $3,850.66, or total receipts amounting to $80,260.04, would show, after the deduction of the two deposits, a balance on hand on March 10, 1876, amounting to $60,232.73.

DEPOSIT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS IN BANK WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW.

H. H. Clapp, chief clerk, testifies:

Question. Do you deposit Government funds in the bank?
Answer. Yes, sir; Government checks, no currency.
Q. Do you draw the checks out of the bank, or the money?
A. I draw currency.
Q. When you made a deposit were you credited with so much money?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you recollect how long you kept this money in the bank?
A. I opened an account some time last fall, I think, in the name of H. H. Clapp, agent.
Q. And placed to the credit of H. H. Clapp, agent, funds belonging to the Government?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Does this bank allow interest on deposits?
A. Yes, sir; but I will say that Mr. Larcombe had formerly gotten our checks cashed at Riggs's, and he went there and he was told that it was too much trouble; that they could not cash them for any price he would be willing to pay. I went to Mr. Ruff and asked him if the use of this money would repay him if I left it in the bank from time to time for the trouble of collecting it. He said it would, and I commenced depositing my checks, with an understanding that no interest at all would be paid.
Q. If you should demand interest, under the rules of the bank, would it not be compelled to pay you interest on the balance?
A. I don't know that.
Q. Are you not aware that the rules of the bank are that you can demand and draw interest on the balances you have there from time to time?
A. I am not.
Q. Is Mr. Ruff, the cashier of that bank, related to you or connected with you?
A. No, sir; no further than that his son is married to my daughter.
Q. When did you draw the money out of Mr. Ruff's bank? I refer to the money of the Government.
A. I don't know that I can state the date.
Q. Was it not the morning after an examination had been made by the clerk of this committee of the cash in Mr. Larcombe's safe in the Congressional Printing Office?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What disposition did you make of the money after drawing it?
A. I turned the portion belonging to me into my safe, and turned over the portion belonging to Mr. Collins to him.
Q. Do I understand you to say that you had, in addition to the money which you had received, a portion of the money received by Mr. Collins from the sales of the Record?
A. Yes.
Q. By what authority did you have possession of the funds?
A. It was nothing but checks. He could not get rid of them, and I said he had better let me deposit them in that way, and we could keep our cash-account without checks. If he had a check and I had a check, I made a deposit on a slip for him, and I deposited on a slip for myself, and when I came back I marked his with with an "R" in red ink, so that it would not get mixed.
Q. It appears that Mr. Ruff first testified before this committee on the 7th of April, 1876, and that on that morning you drew from his bank the sum of $2,912.35.
A. I presume that is correct; I do not recollect the amount.

Mr. Speaker, I have in a most imperfect manner run through such portions of the testimony in this case as I thought bore most directly upon the important points in it. I think it establishes most conclusively the charges which I preferred in the outset of my remarks: First, incapacity; second, malfeasance in office, resulting in great detriment to the Government and heavy pecuniary losses, for which the official bond of A. M. Clapp should be put in suit; and, third, embezzlement under the laws of the United States, for which he should be tried and punished. I shall refer briefly to the law governing the case, and then close.

The first section of the Revised Statutes to which I call attention is section 3617, which reads as follows:

The gross amount of all moneys received from whatever source for the use of the United States, except as otherwise provided in the next section, shall be paid by the officer or agent receiving the same into the Treasury at as early a day as practicable, without any abatement or deduction on account of salary, fees, costs, charges, expenses, or claims of any description whatever.

Under and by virtue of this section without limiting the time within which the money is to be paid over, it shall be done as soon as practicable. Under the provisions of a subsequent section, (3622,) however, the time is definitely prescribed within which these deposits shall be made. Said section reads as follows:

Every officer or agent of the United States who receives public money which he is not authorized to retain as salary, pay, or emolument, shall render his accounts monthly. * * * * * * *

It may be contended that the Congressional Printer is neither an agent nor officer of the United States, but this view of the question is not sustained by a fair interpretation of other sections of the statute, which treat him as a disbursing officer of the Government. Section 3817 reads as follows:

The Congressional Printer shall settle the accounts of his receipts and disbursements in the manner required of other disbursing officers.

In addition, the official bond executed by him is made payable to the United States, and he is charged with the disbursement of funds of the Government not appertaining to the Senate alone, but as well to this House and to the different Departments for which printing is done in his office; though he may be pro forma an officer of the Senate, and doubtless is, yet these sections of the Statutes declare him to be a disbursing officer of the Government, and require him to settle his accounts as other disbursing officers do. Upon failure to do so section 5491 declares the act to be embezzlement, and prescribes the punishment. It reads as follows:

Every officer or agent of the United States, who having received public money which he is not authorized to retain as salary, pay or emolument, fails to render his account for the same, as provided by law, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, and shall be fined in a sum equal to the amount of the money embezzled, and shall be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than ten years.

It is in evidence that the Congressional Printer has retained large sums of money in his hands not for one month only but for years, while he lived in the very shadow of the Treasury, and could have paid it over at any time. But this is not the only case in which he has laid himself liable to a charge of embezzlement.

Section 5488 (Revised Statutes) reads as follows:

Every disbursing officer of the United States who deposits any public money intrusted to him, or converts to his own use in any way whatever, or loans with or without interest, or for any purpose not provided by law, withdraws from the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer or any authorized depository, or for any purpose not prescribed by law, transfers or applies any portion of the public money intrusted to him, is in every such act deemed guilty of embezzlement of the money so deposited, converted, loaned, withdrawn, transferred, or applied, and shall be punished by imprisonment with hard labor for a term not less than one year nor more than ten years, or by fine of not more than the amount embezzled or less than $1,000; or by both such fine and imprisonment.

It is in evidence from the deposition of the cashier of a bank of this city, corroborated by the statements of H. H. Clapp and W. H. Collins, that Government funds have been deposited by the Congressional Printer, through his chief clerk, in direct and open violation of the provisions of the law just cited.

But, by the further provision of this section, it will be seen that if he apply the funds in his hands to any purpose not prescribed by law, then he is guilty of the crime of embezzlement and liable to like punishment. By the admissions of A. M. Clapp himself, as appears in his evidence before the committee, he has applied the money received by him, not by authority of law, but contrary to its express provisions, to purposes other than those contemplated by the statute.

It is clear, by these several acts of placing money in a bank not a Government depository and by applying other sums to purposes not authorized by law, that he has been guilty of the crime of embezzlement.

The only other criminal act of which I propose to take notice is the use of a false voucher in his settlement with the Treasury of the United States. Section 5438 reads as follows:

Every person who makes or causes to be made, or presents or causes to be presented, for payment or approval to or by any person or officer in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, any claim upon or against the Government of the United States, or any Department or officer thereof, knowing such claims to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent, or who, for the purpose of obtaining or aiding to obtain the payment or approval of such claim, makes, uses, or causes to be made or used, any false bill, receipt, voucher, roll, account, claim, certificate, affidavit, or deposition, knowing the same to contain any fraudulent or fictitious statement or entry, * * * shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than one nor more than five years, or fined not less than one thousand nor more than five thousand dollars.

It will be seen from the evidence that a false bill was made out, a receipt thereon obtained from A. S. Solomons, and a check for the amount given to said Solomons, which was paid and subsequently used as a voucher in his settlement with the United States Treasury.

Although this act does not constitute embezzlement, yet it is a crime under the statutes for which he may be indicted and punished.

Mr. Speaker, in my feeble and broken way I have presented this subject to the House. While I have spoken plainly and characterized things by their proper names, I have endeavored to excite no prejudices in the minds of members, nor would I, if I had the power, secure any decision either upon the part of this House or of the country unjust to the Congressional Printer and not fully sustained by the testimony. In what I have done I have had no enemies to punish, no friends to reward. I have endeavored to keep an eye steadily fixed upon the duties of my position, as well those to the person whose conduct has been criticised as to those due myself and to the country. I have felt at every step taken that I had to deal with one who was backed by strong political power and influence, and who relied upon the strength he could muster in the other end of the Capitol for deliverance from the meshes and entanglements into which his official misconduct had brought him. His letter of defiance to the committee denying their right to investigate his acts as Congressional Printer after asking the privilege of appearing before that committee with counsel but too plainly showed the drift of his hopes, his trust, and confidence. He appeals to Cæsar, and to Cæsar let him go. The country will take cognizance of the fact whether a man all over blackened with infidelity and crime, a defaulter and official plunderer, can find defenders or apologists among those who are called to sit in judgment on his case. It is to be seen whether in any forum where he may be called to answer party prejudices and predilections are to outweigh the claims of law and justice.

Under every form of government, but more especially in a republic, the peace, prosperity, and happiness of the governed depend upon the honesty, capacity, and fidelity of those who are called to be rulers. Whenever a people become so demoralized as to tolerate, unrebuked, corruption in their officials, that moment the government begins to sweep the down grade to ruin, gathering impetus as it moves on, until it dashes itself to pieces, covering with its débris the hopes and happiness of a too confiding people.

In the application of these remarks to our people and Government, the fact is not to be disguised that in the light and experience of a hundred years there is but little room to congratulate ourselves upon the sterling integrity of office-holders, the unswerving fidelity to public trusts, and the high standard of official conduct which made our fathers the admiration of the world.

No, sir; corruption stalks brazen-faced through the land. It does not confine its leprous touch to the inmate of the hut of squalid wretchedness, where cold and hunger plead trumpet-tongued for the victim who has violated the decalogue. It has not confined its companionship to outcasts from society, who know no check but human law, to soulless corporations, political cabals, and money rings. It has not consorted only with petty officials who interpose the plea of insufficient salaries to the charge of fraud and peculation. It has stalked boldly into the halls of legislation and left its slimy touch upon the statute-books; it has soiled the judicial ermine, by subordinating the opinion of judges to party politics; it has entered into our revenue service, breeding perjury and robbing the Treasury of millions; it has stolen the rations of the soldier and the Indian; it has followed our accredited ministers abroad, and brought odium upon the American name; it has entered the Cabinet, making merchandise of offices; ay, sir, it has gone to the very door of the presidential mansion and vaunted itself as on most intimate terms with those who are the daily trusted companions of the President of the nation.

What American citizen does not feel the blush of shame upon his cheek as he reads day by day the developments of official misconduct? What citizen traveling abroad, when he reads the comments of foreign journals, morning after morning, upon the venality and corruption of American office-holders, would not be tempted to deny his nationality? Sir, this state of things is terribly appalling. I am not gifted with the power of divination and shall not undertake to play the seer; but, if the lights of history which shine out from the past are not delusive, we are traveling the open broad road marked by the foot-prints of the republics of other days. The march of history is strewn with their wrecks, and the story of one is the story of all, as they have risen, flourished, and passed away. History teaches us that the gradations by which they rose to their culminating point were purity of public and private life, industry, frugality, simplicity of habits, fidelity to trusts assumed or imposed, respect for constitutional and statute law, and a penetrating sense of honor and honesty, whether in office or out of it. These are and ever have been the underlying principles of all well-regulated popular governments, and as long as properly adhered to will give stability and success.

We are further taught that the gradations by which they descended were loss of personal integrity, luxurious habits of living, consequent inertness, the greed of gain, open disregard of the claims of morality and religion, unfaithfulness to public trusts, and finally a shameless, open prostitution of public offices to private ends.

This is the mirror held up to us by the genius of history, and we have only to look into it to see how far we have progressed in the road that leads to anarchy. The inquiry pertinent to the occasion is, can we retrieve ourselves; can we shake off the entanglements and embarrassments which hang about our Government? Can we put down the combinations, rings, and individuals who are sapping the foundations of Government and extracting the life-blood of the nation? Can we make a return to the better days of the Republic?

I answer yes, a thousand times yes. Everywhere the people are clamoring for reform. The cry comes up from every city, town, and hamlet in the country, Overturn the tables of the money-changers and kick out the dove-sellers who pollute our offices and temples of justice. Much has been accomplished and more can yet be done by this House to meet the just expectations of an outraged people. In the case before us the pathway is plain and open. Let us remand A. M. Clapp to the courts of the country, that he may be dealt with civilly and criminally for his violations of law; and if impeachment will lie let us send in articles to the Senate and demand that he be arraigned and tried in that forum. I trust the House will concur in the recommendations made by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] what is the purpose of the Committee on Printing in regard to bringing this question to a vote; whether it is proposed to have a vote this afternoon?

Mr. SINGLETON. That depends upon the wish of the House. I have no proposition of that sort to make; I do not propose myself to force a vote upon this question until it has been fully discussed.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has called for a separate vote on the several resolutions reported from the Committee on Printing. The first resolution will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to certify to the proper authorities of the District of Columbia the testimony heretofore taken by the order of this House relating to the conduct of A. M. Clapp as Congressional Printer, to the end that he may be indicted and prosecuted.

The question was taken upon adopting the resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 117, noes 63.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. YEATES called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 33, noes 61.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 73, not voting 80; as follows:

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON is absent by leave of the House; if present I think he would vote "no."

Mr. BRADLEY. On this question I am paired with Mr. HURD, of Ohio; if present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1922) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real-estate in the District of Columbia; and

An act (H. R. No. 2427) to amend "An act entitled 'An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies,'" approved March 13, 1874.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the second resolution reported from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, is an officer who may be impeached under the Constitution of the United States, and report to the House at as early a day as practicable.

The question was taken upon the resolution, and it was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the last resolution reported by the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved further, That the Committee on Appropriations of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to embody in the sundry civil bill to be reported by them to this House, and in which bill appropriations for the public printing are made, the following sections, to wit:

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. It is not necessary to read the sections. It was the intention of the Committee on Printing to have these sections referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with a request that the committee embody them in the sundry civil appropriation bill. I ask consent to change the word "instructed" to "requested."

Mr. HOLMAN. Also add the words "to inquire into the propriety of embodying," &c.

Mr. HOAR. I object to any change until I can know what these sections are.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. They have all been printed.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care to have them read through.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. They were read and printed last Friday.

Mr. HOAR. What is the effect of them?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. It would take me some time to explain them all; they change existing law.

Mr. HOAR. And provide for the appointment of a new Printer?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. They authorize the appointment of a new Printer by the President of the United States. This matter will all come up for discussion when the bill is reported, if it should be reported by the Committee on Appropriations. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we ought to accede to the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE.] The Committee on Appropriations might want to modify some of these provisions. One of the sections provides for binding Congress to having the congressional debates printed by a particular party for six years. I doubt very much the right, and I have very much greater doubt as to the propriety of this Congress attempting to bind any future Congress. I have also very great doubt whether this matter ought not to be thrown open to public bids, and not assigned to any particular individual.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] will allow me to make a suggestion; I wish to say that I was a very earnest opponent of the present arrangement. I think the House laid down its prerogative when it permitted the Public Printer to be an officer of the Senate, when it gave the entire control of this officer to the other branch of Congress. Without expressing any opinion as to the alleged misconduct of this officer, (for I have not yet formed any opinion on that subject, as I was not able to be here during the discussion,) I wish to say that I shall support very heartily any proposition which will prevent the Public Printer from being in future an officer of the Senate. I do not, however, quite see the power of the Committee on Appropriations to deal with this subject under so limited and narrow an instruction.

Mr. GARFIELD. In an appropriation bill last winter, the provision relating to the Congressional Printer was repealed, so that whenever a vacancy shall occur—so soon as the present occupant of the office dies, resigns, or is removed—the tenure of the office will be entirely changed, and this officer will be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I wish to say in this connection that in my judgment the arrangement by which the Senate was made the appointing power with reference to this officer was a wholly indefensible and, I believe, a wholly unconstitutional provision. To suppose that we could, by an indirection of that sort, make the Senate the power to appoint an officer having public duties not only with regard to the two Houses of Congress, but also with reference to the various Departments of the Government, is to assume that the Senate might appoint the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or any other officer.

But this matter has all been adjusted in the appropriation bill of last year; and it is not necessary now to have any new legislation on the question. Let me say, however, to my colleague [Mr. VANCE] that I should be very sorry if we should now make a sort of legislative contract binding the Government for six years ahead as to the printing of the RECORD. Should there be any charge of exorbitance in regard to this matter, it might find good ground as against this House, should we agree to a measure of this sort without any opportunity for competition.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is simply a proposition to refer these sections to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to inquire into the propriety of their adoption.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; the proposition is that the committee be instructed to report these provisions.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] proposes to strike out that absolute instruction.

Mr. GARFIELD. But objection is made to the modification.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Permit me to say one word. Under the law to which my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] has referred, passed in the last Congress, the present Congressional Printer is in reality made a life officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; the Senate can remove him.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Well, he is in office until removed; his tenure is for life or good behavior; it is the same thing. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention for a moment to these provisions, which we wish to refer to the Committee on Appropriations that they may inquire into their expediency and report them if they see fit.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman who makes this report might just as well refer his tobacco-box to the Committee on Appropriations as refer these sections to that committee for consideration; because, if they should report a bill containing these provisions, it would be subject to a point of order as changing existing law; and this House cannot do indirectly, by a majority vote, what it cannot do directly. It would require a suspension of the rules on Monday by a two-thirds vote to authorize the committee to incorporate these provisions in an appropriation bill.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Every proposition here is germane to the bill and in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. They are not evidently in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir, every one of them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Only speculatively.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. No, sir, directly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive the objection I made to the modification of this resolution.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Then I modify the resolution so as to direct the Committee on Appropriations to inquire into the propriety or expediency of incorporating these provisions in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object to the modification. I think the subject ought to be considered in the House rather than referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. You will have an opportunity to consider it after it comes back.

Mr. HOLMAN. And besides it will be subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] objects to any modification. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of making the modification I shall have to move to reconsider (if it can be done at this stage) the vote by which the previous question was ordered. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois should place us in this position, and make us vote directly upon these propositions without further consideration. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection to the modification. If he does not, I will make the motion to reconsider, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the previous question, being partly executed, cannot now be reconsidered.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was my apprehension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. It is certainly in order to ask for the reading of those sections.

Mr. BALLOU. It ought to be understood that this proposition contemplates the turning over of the printing of the debates from the Government Printing Office to a private contractor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a parliamentary question. The proposition has been made by the gentleman from Indiana to reconsider the previous question. I put to the Chair this point, whether the previous question has partly operated upon this resolution. I grant that it has been entirely executed in regard to the previous resolution, but I say that it has not operated at all in regard to this resolution. Therefore I submit that the motion to reconsider the previous question is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the main question when it has been partly executed. It applies to all the resolutions.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We did not understand the main question had been ordered on all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let us have the resolution and the accompanying bill read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolutions have all been read two or three times.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The resolutions have been read, but I want all the sections of the bill accompanying the resolutions now pending to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are part of the resolutions.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolutions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw my demand for the reading of the bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Is it in order to lay the resolution on the table at this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that it is in order.

Mr. MORRISON. Then I make that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the vote on this proposition should be in the negative and the resolutions should be rejected, will not the previous question then exhaust itself?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it then be in order to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, with a view to recommit the resolution and the sections of the bill accompanying it with instructions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the resolution be rejected, the previous question will exhaust itself, and it will then be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected, and in that way the gentleman can accomplish his purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then instead of laying the resolution on the table I suggest that the resolution be voted down, when I propose to move to reconsider, and when reconsidered, to suggest a modification of the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table.

The resolution was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. That brings the resolution again before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to recommit the resolution with instructions to strike out the provision making it imperative upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is in order. The resolution was rejected and the vote by which it was rejected was reconsidered when the previous question exhausted itself, and the resolution now being before the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has the right to make the motion he indicates.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Is not the resolution brought back into precisely the same state in which it was before the rejection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is brought back with the previous question exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to have the resolution so modified as to make the subject a matter of inquiry, instead of imperative upon the Committee on Appropriations, to embrace the sections accompanying the resolution in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope that the Committee on Printing will have leave to report at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Printing with instruction instead of leaving it as it is imperative upon the Committee on Appropriations, to direct them to make inquiry into the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN's motion was agreed to; and the resolution was recommitted with instructions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the first resolution was adopted, and would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Printing, to strike out the words "to the end he may be indicted and prosecuted," and substitute therefor "to the end the same may be laid before the grand jury for proper action."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to such reconsideration and modification of the first resolution?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of April 7, 1876, a report of reductions in the estimates contained in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY SCOTT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information in regard to the claim of Mrs. Mary Scott, of Jessamine County, Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Mr. WARD. I ask unanimous consent that the commercial relations transmitted to the House by the Secretary of State, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, be printed pursuant to section 3798 of Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the rule imperative that all such matters should be referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. WARD. The statutes require the printing of this document.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules require the question, as to the number of copies to be printed, shall go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WARD. The statute regulates the printing of this document; but I do not object to the reference to the Committee on Printing. My only object is to facilitate the printing of the document at the earliest moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of printing is referred to the Committee on Printing.

E. K. SNEAD.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3466) for the relief of the sureties of E. K. Snead, late collector of internal revenue of the first district of Virginia, and for the release of the said Snead's estate from liability for the loss of certain books of special-tax stamps and coupons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JONES COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. HYMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3467) to re-imburse Jones County, North Carolina, for the loss accruing from the destruction of the court-house by the forces of the United States in the year 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAUSES AT INSTANCE OF A STATE.

Mr. HOGE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolutions; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the Supreme Court has recently refused to advance and hear a cause at the instance of a State, wherein said State was the party in interest, in preference to civil causes pending in said court between private parties, under the provisions of section 949 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report at the earliest practicable day what legislation, in addition to section 949 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, is necessary to secure to a State, when the party in interest in a cause pending in the courts of the United States, preference in trial to civil causes pending in said courts between private parties.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PIPER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3468) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MARIA L. LEE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3469) granting a pension to Maria L. Lee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolution, which I desire to have put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I can only yield for references. I shall have to insist on my motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN's motion, it was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole had this bill formerly under consideration there was an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 5, line 11, after the words "owned by the postmaster," strike out the words "and two-thirds of the box-rents;" so that it will read by adding to an amount of the box-rents of the office, received or estimated, not exceeding $1,200, when the boxes are supplied and owned by the postmaster, and not to exceed $1,000 when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster, commissions on all other postal revenues of the office to an amount not exceeding $1,300, at the following rates, namely, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, there were—ayes 40, noes 69.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer also the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "postmaster," in line 13 of the section, insert these words: "Provided that at such office the postmaster shall at least receive $700 per annum out of the box rents, if so much as that shall be collected." So that it will read: "And two-thirds of the box rents, and not to exceed $1,000, when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster, provided that at such office the postmaster shall at least receive $700 per annum out of box rents, if so much as that shall be collected."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if he would not be inclined to accept this amendment? It is to do away with punishing the small class of officers in the country, where, by the liberality and enterprise of the citizens, there has been furnished a good post-office room and good boxes to the Government free of rent. Where the Government pays the rent for the room or the post-office—I mean a bona fide rent—and the postmaster furnishes the boxes, by the bill you allow him $1,200. But where they are a little more liberal and enterprising and add the boxes, and give both the room and the boxes to the Government rent free, or for a nominal rent, as they do in two cities in my district, you cut off the postmaster with less than $700 box rents, because in this class of cases you only allow two-thirds of the box rents.

Now, my amendment would allow in that class of offices all the box-rents up to $700 to the postmaster. In the other class of offices the bill allows all the box-rents up to $1,200 to the postmaster. There is, therefore, a difference of $500 between the two classes. The effect of my amendment is to make the commissions and the box rents amount to $2,000; thereby in cities of eight thousand and ten thousand people placing it in the power of the Postmaster-General under the postal code to make an allowance for clerk hire in that class of offices if needed. Otherwise, under the postal code—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to this statement—the Postmaster-General does not have the power to give one cent for clerk hire to that class of offices; although one or two clerks are frequently needed, and in a few cases three. Now, a postmaster having a compensation of less than $2,000 could not pay the salaries of these three clerks and have anything left, and hence the office would have to be substantially cut off.

I am not antagonizing the bill, but I come, representing my committee, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for the time being, in a unanimous recommendation that an amendment in substance such as I have offered to this bill be adopted. I will admit that great wisdom and great industry reside in the gentleman from Indiana and his colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations. But it must be remembered that they have to spread themselves out in three short months over every department of the Government, and in all modesty and fairness I do suggest in a matter not only of economy but in a matter of substantial justice in equalizing these salaries, that the committee of this House possessing, I think, a fair amount of intelligence, who have investigated the matter carefully and laboriously, ought at least to be heard on a suggestion of this kind that is evidently equitable and right.

I say again that I have no desire to antagonize the gentleman's economy in this bill in the main as to revising salaries, but I appeal to him with this explanation to accept this amendment and let the recommendation of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which was unanimously made, be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois must know that this bill actually adopts a higher standard of compensation to the postmasters than the bill agreed upon by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; in other words, if I understand this matter, that committee fixed the salary at $1,200 as the limit of commissions, while this bill fixes them at $1,300. This bill is actually more liberal, but it is liberal to all equally, while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] would so amend the bill as to make it apply to one or two offices only so far as increase is concerned. This bill—and I hope the gentleman from Illinois and the whole committee will be fully informed in this respect—was framed on the judgment of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and in that respect has the full approval of the Committee on Appropriations, and it provides that where the boxes are furnished by the Government or at a low cost to the postmaster he shall receive two-thirds of the rents up to a given sum, which is an amount one-third more than the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads allows. But when the boxes are furnished by the postmaster himself he gets the whole of the box rents.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I submit that the Committee on Appropriations in the bill reported to the House by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads allows only two-thirds of the box rents not to exceed $1,000. The bill now reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations allows one-third more box rents to the postmaster than was reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. That is the point that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is trying to impress upon the House, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to that point.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 36.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on this amendment; this is a very important feature of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints as tellers Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. HOLMAN.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 37.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted, but I will not call for a vote now as we can have one in the House.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish, for the purpose of equalizing the bill somewhat, inasmuch as this is an increase of salary, to move an amendment to strike out the word "thirteen" where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve;" so that it will read:

Of the office to an amount not exceeding $1,200, at the following rates, namely: on the first $100 per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $400 per quarter, 50 per cent.; and 30 per cent. on all revenues exceeding $400 per quarter; but the aggregate of the said commissions not to exceed $1,200.

The effect of the amendment adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is to increase certain salaries of postmasters. The object of it was to enable certain postmasters to get the benefit of clerical force allowed to officers having salaries exceeding $2,000. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had fixed as the basis of compensation of box rents up to $1,000 per annum, on commissions up to $1,200, in view of the fact that under the provisions of this bill the box rents, when the Government furnishes the boxes, would go two-thirds to the benefit of the postmaster and one-third to the benefit of the Government. The Committee on Appropriations struck out $1,200 and inserted $1,300, which embraced commissions up to 30 per cent. If gentlemen will take the report on page 34 of the Committee on Appropriations, they will have some general idea of the effect of this bill on the salaries of postmasters. Gentlemen know that the salaries of these officers are quite high; they are greatly above corresponding salaries paid in the States or in private business, and the effect of the amendment just adopted is to increase certainly the salaries. I can scarcely conceive that the committee really intended to increase these salaries above the rate fixed by this bill, for every expression that comes to the Committee on Appropriations from outside sources has been that these salaries are now high enough and generally too high. I have heard no contrary opinion expressed except by gentlemen who hold the offices in the first, second, and third classes. The committee has published in connection with the bill a report showing the effect of the bill upon the postmasters in Ohio of the first, second, and third class. To illustrate the amount to which the salaries are reduced in accordance with the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, we make the small salaries a little higher than those recommended by the Postmaster-General, but we make them lower in the second and third class. I offer this amendment and I trust it will be adopted. It affects the higher salaries to the extent of about $100 a year upon salaries reaching $1,000.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If I understand this proposition—and I am confident that I do—it is a proposed reduction of the salaries of every postmaster to the extent of $100, arising from commissions, who gets a salary of $1,000 or upward in the United States, from the amount fixed by the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is only just what your bill fixes it at.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Just at the amount that the bill from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads fixes it at, so far as commissions are concerned. I am rejoiced to know he is able on that proposition to agree with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. I could not help myself.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am delighted with the result so far as the gentleman has gone, and I ask the gentleman if he had not better travel the balance of the way and adopt the whole bill of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, for if he does he will increase the box rents to postmasters at the time that he decreases the commissions. It is not just to cut down, as that committee suggests, and purport to do so upon its recommendation, unless the gentleman also increases as the same committee suggests. The gentleman said that owing to the fact that this House had, by the adoption of my amendment, indicated a desire to raise by $100 of box rents the salaries of postmasters, therefore he would propose to cut down the commissions by $100. Now the House has not done any such thing as that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is the idea I gathered from the gentleman's remarks. Now, all in the world that the House did by the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was in perhaps five or six offices in a State, at least a small number, to give the postmasters the box rents up to $700, if they collect that amount, where the Government owns the boxes, or rather the boxes are given to the Government. In all the United States it would not increase the salaries of postmasters in the aggregate over from $5,000 to $15,000 more than the bill proposes. The amendment was a mere matter of justice and equalization. Yet the gentleman gets up here and gravely states in his place that, because the House adopted that just amendment, it will cut off $100 from the compensation of every postmaster who receives over $1,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. You thought it right.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I agreed in committee that the sum of $1,200 might be reported, and I propose to stand by it. But when you do this because the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads recommended it, had you not better fix the box rents also at what that committee recommended, and thus make this bill symmetrical? In other words, the increase in box-rents would equal your decrease in commissions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will only state that this amendment is in harmony, as to commissions, with the report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. That is true, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 6. That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the box-rents collected at their offices, and commissions on other postal revenues of their offices at the following rates, namely: On the first $100, or less, per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100, and not over $400, per quarter, 50 per cent.; and all over $400 per quarter, 30 per cent.; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of such postmasters: Provided, That when the aggregate annual compensation, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, of any postmaster of this class shall amount to $1,000, the said Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General in order that such postmaster may be assigned to his proper class, and a salary fixed as heretofore provided.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend the section just read by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the minimum annual compensation of any postmaster shall not be less than $25: And provided also, That wherever the aggregate annual compensation of any postmaster shall amount to less than $300, the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to pay such salary, not exceeding that amount, as he is satisfied will be a reasonable compensation for the postmaster's services.

Mr. WHITE. This section provides that when the compensation of a postmaster shall amount to $1,000 a year, he shall be assigned by the Postmaster-General to his proper class with a fixed salary. But it fails to provide that where a postmaster is performing service that is worth more than the revenues of his office amount to, he shall receive a reasonable compensation for his services.

It is not the fault of the postmaster that the neighborhood for which he is postmaster is thinly populated. He must be at his post when the mail comes in or goes out, must distribute what little mail there is at a great inconvenience to him, and very frequently he receives for a whole year's service the enormous sum of twelve or fifteen dollars. Many of these postmasters who receive but $75 per annum do more work than other postmasters who receive $200 or $300 per annum. There should be some provision in this bill to remedy this injustice to the small postmasters.

I think what I have submitted in reference to this case should recommend this amendment to the favorable consideration of the House, and I hope it will be adopted. If, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, these postmasters are already sufficiently compensated he will not give them any more; but if in his opinion a postmaster is doing three hundred dollars' worth of service and receiving only $50 compensation, he will give him the additional amount or such portion of it as he may deem his services worth.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 7. That railroad companies furnishing cars or parts of cars for the exclusive accommodation of the United States mails and the agents in charge of said mails, for what is known as postal-car, route-agent, or baggage-car service, shall be paid at the following uniform rates, to wit: When by an order of the Postmaster-General the mail-car is attached to trains or space set apart for through or express mails on trains run regularly during any quarter on a schedule time between terminal points at a rate of speed not exceeding twenty-five miles per hour, six mills per linear foot of interior full-width car space per mile run; attached to or set apart on trains run regularly during any quarter on a schedule time between terminal points at a rate of speed exceeding twenty-five miles, seven mills per linear foot of interior full-width car space per mile run: Provided, That no railroad company transporting the United States mail shall, when all the requirements of the Postmaster-General under the laws governing the transportation of the mail by railroad are complied with, be paid a less rate than $25 per mile of road per annum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the section just read by striking out the word "six" before "mills," and inserting "not exceeding five;" so that it will read "not exceeding five mills per linear foot;" also, by striking out the word "seven" before "mills," and inserting "not exceeding six;" so that it will read "not exceeding six mills per linear foot," &c. Then there should be a further amendment, inasmuch as these are maximum sums, to strike out the word "uniform" in the phrase "shall be paid at the following uniform rates." As these three propositions together constitute but one amendment, and have already been somewhat considered by this committee in discussing other provisions of this bill, I shall not have occasion at this time to submit any remarks.

Mr. ATKINS. I am not quite satisfied with this section of the bill, even with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] very roundly asserted here the other day that under this bill some railroads would receive for transporting the mails over $1,000 per mile. If that be true, then I am satisfied the rates here proposed are too high. I do not believe that this Government ought to pay any road $1,000 per mile for transporting the mails; I was about to say that I did not care how much mail was carried. I would say to my friend from Indiana that I am apprehensive he has not in his amendment put the rates at sufficiently low figures. I am rather inclined to believe that the rates should be 4 and 5 mills instead of 5 and 6 mills, as he proposes. I move to amend his amendment by making it 4 and 5 mills instead of 5 and 6; and I give notice that at the proper time I shall move an amendment to come in at the close of the section.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was declared adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division on this question. All I ask is that the exact effect of the amendment shall be well understood. I am anxious that the rates shall be reduced to the lowest possible point at which it is proper and just for Congress to require the mails to be carried. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] overlooks the fact that the amount paid to any one railroad company depends not only under this plan but under the existing law upon the amount of business thrown upon any given road. Under the existing law the compensation is regulated by car space furnished and the weight of the mails. Under the present bill we propose to fix the compensation on the basis of space furnished alone. Now it will be seen that under either plan, on the route, for instance, between New York and Chicago, where vast mails can be accumulated, compensation either by weight or by car space could be run up to a high rate per mile. I apprehend that such a result is inevitable. Either you must allow such a possibility or you must impose such restraints upon the Postmaster-General as may greatly embarrass the proper administration of his Department.

I have carefully examined, as I presume my friend from Tennessee has done, the report made to the Senate by the Transportation Committee of the last Congress—report No. 478, first session Forty-third Congress; and I am led to believe that at 5 and 6 mills—an average of 5½ mills per mile—the mails can be carried with a fair profit to the railroad companies. I am not certain that 4 and 5 mills, averaging 4½ mills, will not be a sufficient compensation. It is very clear that this great body of corporations that now largely control the postal interests of the country, constituting a great monopoly not only in reference to the transportation of the mails but also with regard to the general commerce of the country, should not be allowed by Congress a higher compensation than is fair and reasonable. I shall favor the lowest rates that the Committee of the Whole may think consistent with the public service. All I ask is that there shall be a distinct understanding of the proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] fixing certain rates as the maximum, would, with the limitation which I gave notice I would offer as an amendment, leave it in the power of the Post-Office Department to make contracts which would secure the public service without detriment to the interests of the carriers by railroad.

I want to say to my friend from Tennessee that, while by his amendment the aggregate would be sufficient for all necessary purposes, yet under the system adopted, unless some discretion be given to the Postmaster-General, it would still leave the pay of the leading roads, the great trunk roads, too large, while the compensation of roads upon which the mails are light would be too small. Unless the Postmaster-General be enabled by law to arrange the equities of the case, the whole system would be found to work as suggested by him in his annual report, giving too large compensation to trunk lines and too meager compensation to the small lines. But taking the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] providing certain maximum rates, and then adding the proviso which I shall offer after this amendment is acted on, we may enable the Postmaster-General to carry on the service without doing injustice to anybody and yet to give just compensation to the railroad companies.

Mr. ATKINS. May I ask the gentleman to state the proviso which he proposes to offer?

Mr. REAGAN. I propose to add to the proviso at the end of this section the words "nor more than $450 per mile per annum;" so that the proviso will read thus:

Provided, That no railroad company transporting the United States mail shall, when all the requirements of the Postmaster-General, under the laws governing the transportation of the mail by railroad, are complied with, be paid a less rate than $25 per mile of road per annum, nor more than $450 per mile per annum.

Some gentlemen have expressed to me a doubt whether $450 is sufficient.

Mr. ATKINS. Say $500.

Mr. REAGAN. I will leave that to the judgment of the House. In my view, $450 is a sufficient maximum. Under the law of 1873, the maximum on first-class roads, for night service and everything else, could not be more than $375 a mile; and it has occurred to me that an addition of $75 per mile would be sufficient. It is right, however, to say that this change of system involves some new expense to the railroads in this: that it is proposed to have the cars fitted up and clerks employed in them for the distribution of the mails. But this would take from the distributing offices, as we have had them, a portion of their force; and thereby the expenses of those offices would be to some extent reduced. I think that $450 would be a sufficient maximum; certainly it approximates closely to the proper limit, and with this maximum fixed I would be inclined to risk the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana as being likely to give reasonable compensation to railroads carrying light mail.

Mr. ATKINS. In view of the amendment which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has indicated, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, we are talking here, it seems to me, a great deal, and from the manner in which we talk I think we are talking a great deal about what we know little about. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] proposes to cut down the pay of the railroads to 4 mills per mile; and why? Because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has said that certain railroads are going to get a great deal of money, and he is opposed to giving a great deal of money to certain railroads. Does it matter to the Government whether we pay to one road or to two roads, provided we have the service? Is it a matter of any importance to the gentleman whether we pay a road $500 or $1,000 per mile if the road that takes the $1,000 does twice the service of the road that gets $500?

We are apparently legislating here simply in a manner to fight railroads. Now that seems to me to be poor policy.

The information, Mr. Chairman, which I have is this: that a large number of the smaller railroads carrying ten feet at 5 mills a foot will only get $30 or $31 per mile per annum. To many of the roads it will not pay the cost of messengers to attend to them—the messengers who take the mails from the depots and carry them to the post-office. The road, for instance, from New York to Philadelphia, from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, from Pittsburgh to Columbus, to Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and on to Saint Louis, carries a large amount of mail. It carries mails to those points to distribute them. It must receive a larger amount of pay to enable it to carry the mails rapidly, and we should be willing to give the road a larger amount of pay. My information is that the fast mail which runs from New York to Buffalo and on to Toledo, one branch from Toledo to Saint Louis and another to Chicago, runs from thirty to thirty-five miles an hour, and that it will be compelled to stop even at 6 mills per linear foot of car space.

The gentleman says put a limit. If you have the words "not exceeding," does not that give the ability to the honest postmaster to make a trade with the railroad and to fix a limit? Are we supposed to be better traders than our executive officers, who are at the head of the Departments? We say they may go below, but, if they wish to raise, the gentleman from Texas says "You shall not go beyond a certain amount." That certainly seems to me to be poor policy. At 4 mills we will cut off all the smaller roads—destroy the carrying power of all the small roads. At 5 and 6 mills you cut down every single fast mail in the country.

Gentlemen say fast mails are of no great importance. The fast mail carries to Saint Louis, to Buffalo, and to Chicago bills from New York. They are received at once, and are returned with the money collected, saving twenty-four hours of interest to the great traders of Chicago, Saint Louis, and Cincinnati. The very interest saved will more than pay the cost.

Now I must speak of Chicago, [laughter,] although I do it with diffidence. I am modest; and I do it with diffidence, because that town has talked so much for itself that every one who says anything about it on this floor is supposed to be "blowing." Millions upon millions of dollars in bills pass between Chicago and New York every day. Twenty-four hours saved is the saving of that much interest upon the millions of dollars of bills sent between Chicago and New York for collection. The saving to the farmers and small traders everywhere is more than to the people of Chicago. Chicago is simply the "go-between," the "middleman" between the great merchants of the East and the farmers of the West.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to multiply words to any considerable extent on this question; but I agree with my colleague from Illinois that to a very great extent we are striking in the dark in this legislation. Ay, and I should not wonder if even my colleague, if this bill is passed, should come to see he too was striking in the dark. What is this bill? It proposes to fix a uniform compensation for railroad transportation all over the United States, whether there be much or little business, whether space is the principal object to the railroad or the making a trip is the principal object to the railroad.

The gentleman also says in this connection in regard to a great many of the small roads of the country from eight to twelve feet is enough. Certainly it is enough, but it cuts the pay down on this class of roads, even at six mills, nearly one-half. Yet upon these other large roads, which run so much more rolling-stock and more trains, and utilize all their space, it greatly increases their pay. O, but says the gentleman, it will cut off the fast-mail service! I do not understand that it will cut off the fast-mail service. It is true that the gentleman from Indiana has spoken of the report of the Transportation Committee and of the price of commutation to passengers. But I appeal to the gentleman whether it is not the fact that these roads—I mean the great trunk lines—can do the mail service at greatly less pay than they now get, while the small roads cannot afford to do it for less than they now get. But here you apply the same schedule of pay to the small roads and the big roads.

How is it that these big roads can carry passengers at two cents a mile while your roads in Illinois and Texas require three and four cents a mile? Because the most of the car-space on the large roads is utilized, and it requires no more engines to draw a train full of passengers than one partially full. Hence passenger rates are different on different roads, and a bill ought to be devised providing different compensation for different roads; but under this bill the rate for both is made the same.

I desire to refer to another point. I have been challenged in private by two or three gentlemen as to my information how these great trunk lines which utilize the whole of their space can afford to sell commutation tickets at less than four mills per mile. The correctness of the statement has been denied. Now, I have in my hand, and will incorporate in my remarks, a statement made by one of the most competent men, in my opinion, in the country in regard to such matters. I refer to Hon. Mr. Davis, adjuster of pay of railroads in the Post-Office Department. The statement is as follows, speaking of the Erie Railroad:

The Counting-house Monitor shows the commutation rates for passengers whom the company engaged to carry daily to an fro throughout the year were, for a distance of 10 miles from New York City, a little over 9½ (9.584) mills per mile; for a distance of 48 miles, a little under 4 (3.918) mills per mile; and for a distance of 88 miles, a little over 3½ (3.267) mills per mile, the rate decreasing in every instance as the distance increased. Comparing the regular rate of fare for passengers traveling the greatest distance, that is, for through passengers, with the commutation rate for the greatest distance, the former, being 22 mills, is 6.73 times as great as the latter, which is 3.267 mills, (22÷3.267=6.73+.) These two rates are deemed to be the fairest for comparison. But the lowest commutation rate on the Erie is not as low as that of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, on which annual tickets between Philadelphia and Baltimore, a distance of 98 miles, for a year commencing on the 1st of January, as it is ascertained by inquiry from an officer of the company, are sold for $200, which is at the rate of 3.260 mills per mile; and the average rate for a less average distance on several other roads mentioned in the Monitor is still less, the rate being for 88 miles on the New Jersey Midland 2.904 mills; for 73 miles on the New York, New Haven and Hartford, 3.194 mills; for 62 miles on the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, 3.220 mills; for 59 miles on the Long Island, 2.978 mills; for 54 miles on the South Side, 3.254 mills; and for 40 miles on the New Jersey, 3.394 mills—an average rate for the whole of 3.126 mills per mile for an average distance of 66⅔ miles.

Thus it will be seen the commutation rates on these roads are a little over 3 mills a mile, yet for the same space a passenger takes you propose the Government shall pay 5 and 6 mills.

Mr. STONE. How much travel have they?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Why, sir, their cars are full, I presume, as a general rule; hence the company can afford to carry at these prices, and that is the kind of a customer the Government becomes of the railways. The Government takes the whole space both ways, and pays full price for it whether it is filled or not; yet you propose the Government should pay nearly twice as much as individual passengers do under the same circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. How does the gentleman make his comparison between a passenger and the linear foot?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. A passenger is agreed by all gentlemen to represent a linear foot across the car; in other words, a fifty-foot car carries fifty passengers when full.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. Are not these commutation tickets sold for the entire year?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Of course; but then you propose the Government should be just that kind of a customer, to pay for every inch of space usually occupied by its mails and this, too, whether the car is empty or full. Under this bill there is no hauling of empty mail cars by the company without pay, full pay, both ways, whether the space is filled with mail or not, and the cars to run every day and on many roads more frequently, and over the whole length of the road, and you know the longer the haul the more profitable it is to the company; still the Government is to pay nearly twice as much as the commutation passenger.

Now in view of these facts I do hope, before we go into this thing blindfold and stumbling, that this bill will be recommitted to the committee or this section stricken out, and that the committee and the House will get some intelligent knowledge on the subject, and fully understand the same. This bill to my mind is a corner to bleed the Government greatly more than it is being bled under the present law.

Mr. HARRISON. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I renew it.

The question being taken on Mr. ATKINS's amendment to Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the following amendment.

In section 7, page 10, line 14, strike out all after "miles" down to "provided," in line 16, and substitute the following: "And not over thirty miles per hour, not exceeding 6 mills per linear foot of interior full-width car space per mile run; attached to or set apart on trains run during any quarter, on a schedule time between terminal points, at a rate of speed exceeding thirty miles per hour, not exceeding 7 mills per linear foot of interior full-width car space per mile run."

That simply gives 6 mills, the rate adopted in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, up to thirty miles an hour and 7 mills above thirty miles. That will simply touch the rates from New York to Saint Louis, by way of Pittsburgh and Columbus and Indianapolis; from New York to Cincinnati, by Pittsburgh; and from Cincinnati to Louisville; and by the same route on to Chicago and Saint Louis, by way of Toledo.

The question being taken on Mr. HARRISON's amendment, there were—ayes 33, noes 77.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of the section, after the words "per annum," add these words: "nor more than $450 per mile of road per annum."

Mr. LAWRENCE. I propose to avail myself of this opportunity to say a word on a totally different matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us get through this section first.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will only occupy a moment. It is in order, I believe, when we are in Committee of the Whole to speak of everything except the matter that is before the committee. I do not propose, therefore, to violate the rules or proprieties on such occasions; but I rise simply for the purpose of saying that when the vote was taken yesterday on the silver-resumption bill I was detained in the Judiciary Committee on an investigation and the examination of witnesses. If I had been here I should have voted for that bill. I am not sure that it was wise to have commenced on the policy of silver resumption; but, having commenced on it, I think it is better to go on with it, as we can probably learn by this silver-resumption measure that gold resumption on the 1st January, 1877, is a total impossibility. I should have voted for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are not in order during the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, yes, my remarks are in order; as much in order as the remarks which have been made generally upon this bill.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I hope that the amendment will be voted down, and that the compensation by space will give every road the actual pay for the services performed. It would not be just to one of the large roads upon which a large amount of mail matter is thrown, given in the official figures as high as $70,000 per day, that their compensation should be limited in any way; they should be paid for the services performed by the space occupied, the same as others.

The question was taken on Mr. REAGAN's amendment; and on a division there were ayes 29, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment: I move to strike out the word "twenty-five" in line 20, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty," and to add at the end of the section the following:

And not less than $25 per mile to roads not carrying a route-agent or mail-messenger.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the gentleman from Illinois discusses that amendment, I ask him to allow me to move that the committe rise, so that we may have an evening session at which we can finish the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now take a recess until seven and a half o'clock.

Many MEMBERS. Say eight o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will modify my motion so as to say eight o'clock; but before asking for a vote upon it I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE.]

EXPENSES OF THE NEW ORLEANS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House the sum of $9,000 to defray the expenses of the select committee, of which Hon. RANDALL L. GIBSON is chairman, appointed under a resolution of this House of the 26th day of April, 1876, with leave to sit in New Orleans, to investigate the New Orleans custom-house and other Federal offices in Louisiana, and the receipt of the Sergeant-at-Arms for said money shall be a good and sufficient voucher in the settlement at the Treasury of the accounts of the said Clerk. That the Sergeant-at-Arms shall pay the current expenses of said committee on vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object to that resolution, but I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose to have all this entire fund under the control of the committee. I think the practice is not the usual practice. The usual practice is that the Sergeant-at-Arms should meet the current expenses of the committee and report to the Clerk of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. This resolution was prepared at the instance of Mr. HOSKINS, a member of the committee, who states that it is in the usual form.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not customary to put the entire sum of money appropriated under the control of the deputy sergeant-at-arms who accompanies the committee. He meets the current expenses and the money is left with the Clerk, from whom he draws it as required.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I understood that the law passed in reference to this matter placed the money in the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that this resolution does not change the responsibility; it merely puts the money in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, but the payments will be under the authority of the chairman of the committee, and the chairman of the committee is responsible for its expenditure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the words "that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall pay the current expenses of the committee and report to the House."

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would suggest to the gentleman that he add "upon vouchers duly certified by the chairman of the committee." That is the usual practice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the words "that the Sergeant-at Arms shall pay the current expenses of said committee on vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee."

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I accept that modification.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

OFFICES OF DOORKEEPER AND SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. LEWIS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules inquire, and report without delay, whether any substantial reason exists why the offices of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of this House should not be consolidated in the Sergeant-at-Arms, as in the Senate.

E. & W. BUDER.

Mr. HARTZELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3470) for the relief of E. & W. Buder, of Cairo, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now insist on my motion for a recess.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 68, noes 69.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for tellers on that proposition; we have to hold evening sessions if we intend to adjourn before next fall.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FORT and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 65.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. PLAISTED. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Statesbury, Robert Hall & Son, and 228 other manufacturers and workingmen of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, against the reduction of import duties on foreign goods which enter into competition with American manufactures, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WELLS, of Missouri: The petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, for the removal or sale of Columbian Armory building on account of its dilapidated appearance and the riotous conduct of persons who assemble therein at balls and parties, subjecting persons living in the vicinity to annoyance, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. H. RITCHIE, of Formosa, China.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the application, together with additional papers, of A. C. Crawford, praying that his claim may be re-examined by the Committee on Claims or by the Senate. I move that these papers be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. In this connection I also move that the order of the Senate heretofore made concurring in the adverse report of the committee in this case be reconsidered, and that the papers already on the files of the Senate be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, remonstrating against any reduction in the salaries of the officials in the Patent Office as contemplated by House bill No. 2571, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of C. D. Grisham, of Marion County, Illinois, praying for a repeal of the resumption act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Grundy County, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Nettle Creek to Morris, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, in favor of making the Signal Service a separate Bureau and placing it on the same footing with the most favored branch of the Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONOVER presented the petition of James G. Gibbes, of Columbia, South Carolina, praying that he may be refunded certain moneys advanced to Union soldiers during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of H. L. Stout and others, of Dubuque, Iowa, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River between Saint Paul, Minnesota, and Keokuk, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William H. Nessle, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hold in my hand the petition of John R. Geary, which was referred to the Committee on Claims. It seems that Mr. Geary was connected with one of our consulates abroad; that the consul, as he alleges, either by profligacy or extravagance, became largely indebted; and that he, Geary, advanced money to assist him in his embarrassment. Mr. Geary insists that, by reason of his connection with this consul and this payment of money, the Government owes it to its self-respect and duty to refund him the money. Your committee conclude that the Government is under no such obligation, either legally or morally, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Welsh, praying compensation for property alleged to have been destroyed by United States troops in 1864, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Edward Welsh, praying compensation for property destroyed during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Mannion, praying compensation for property destroyed during the late war by United States troops, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I deem it proper to say in connection with these three petitions that on Monday morning I called the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to these cases which the committee had then agreed to report. He at that time submitted some additional testimony which has been considered by the committee; but inasmuch as it in no manner reaches the objection which the committee then had, I report the cases back as I have already stated.

I am also directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Bernard Pitzer, of Roanoke, Virginia, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by United States troops in 1863, to report adversely. The committee have examined the petition, but there is no testimony accompanying it, and they therefore ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the sureties of J. W. P. Huntington, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 831) requiring the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from certain streets in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 716) to authorize the execution of a resolution of the national council of the Osage Indians, to report adversely. The bill is of importance to certain parties who have received $50,000 as attorney fees, and the bill contemplates the payment of about $180,000 more out of the funds of the Osage Indians. I state this fact because the bill is of some importance to the parties to be affected by it. The committee have given due consideration to the subject, and their conclusion is—and I am instructed to make that report—that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to this bill, as he introduced it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, that I may have an opportunity to examine the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Smalls, of South Carolina, praying an allowance of prize money for the capture of the steamer Planter, in 1862, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 839) to provide for the establishment of a board of land commissioners; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 841) for the relief of Bayse N. Westcott; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. ROBINSON.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senate, with the concurrence of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, to recommit to that committee the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of William S. Robinson, of Malden, Massachusetts, which the committee reported adversely.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will say in reference to the bill that I have learned from my friend from Massachusetts that there are some circumstances in connection with the case and some facts not known to the committee at the time it was considered. I have no objection to the recommittal of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. OGLESBY. I yesterday morning asked the indulgence of the Senate to take a bill up and gave some reasons why it should pass at that time. I stated that I would ask the indulgence of the Senate again this morning to take up the bill and pass it for reasons which I will again state.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3136) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made.

The bill proposes to amend section 101 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan,' approved June 10, 1872," approved March 3, 1875; so as to read:

That the act approved June 10, 1872, entitled "An act for the restoration to market of certain lands in Michigan," be, and is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to be issued to three hundred and twenty members of the Ottawas and Chippewas of Michigan for the selections found to have been made by them, but which were not, prior to the passage of said act, regularly reported and recognized by the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and the remainder of said lands not disposed of and not valuable mainly for pine timber shall be subject to entry under the homestead laws.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will state again to the Senate the peculiarity of this case. There are one or two townships in Michigan which are in an Indian reservation, and Congress has got through with fixing the title in the Indians. The law was amended once or twice so as to get some two or three hundred Indians secured in their title. The law also provided that all lands not valuable for pine timber might be taken up under the homestead law within the period of one year, but if at the expiration of one year it was not all taken up, then it should be sold at public sale at $2.50 or $1.25 an acre, I do not remember which. That year has expired, but a notice of sixty days is required to be given under the regulations of the Interior Department. Those sixty days will in a very short time expire. The bill simply provides that the land, probably 20,000 acres, shall be open for homestead settlement, and that settlers may go upon it under the homestead law and make actual settlement upon it under that law, instead of putting it into the market.

The bill applies only to Michigan, where these two townships are situated. The bill puts the land back under the homestead-settlement law; that is all. The land was exempted from it in some sense in the statutes which this bill refers to, and the Committee on Public Lands thought that as it was public land and not valuable for pine timber, nor mineral, but simply ordinary public land, the best disposition of it would be to open it to homestead settlement, and not to preemption or to sale. That was the motive which controlled the committee, and the reason why I ask its passage is that the homestead settlers may have a chance to go upon it before the expiration of the sixty days.

The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has called my attention to a clerical error in the bill. The bill reads "that section one hundred one of an act entitled 'An act,'" &c. The words "one hundred" should be stricken out in the third line of the bill, so as to read "that section one of an act," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS FOR ARMY SUPPLIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to call to the notice of the Senate House bill No. 1218, and I ask the attention of Senators to this subject and for just one moment. My intention was to call it up and insist upon its being put on its passage, or, at least, that it should receive consideration, this morning. Under the circumstances, and as I am appealed to by the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] and also the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN,] who have to leave the Senate to be absent for some time, I shall not press it; but I will state the nature of the bill.

The bill passed the House at the last Congress, having been reported from the Treasury Department, and it provides for the payment of the claims that were allowed under the act of 1870 for commissary and quartermaster stores in the resolution of that year. The bill was passed at the last Congress by the House and came to the Senate, but at so late an hour that we were unable to consider it. It was reported from the Committee on Claims at that time, and the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Scott, having charge of the bill, stated that we had been unable to examine it with such care as that we could say in all respects it was correct. The Committee on Claims, having had the same bill before them at the last session, have again examined it and are satisfied with the correctness of the bill. This report was made from the Department eighteen months ago, and was also made to this Congress at the commencement of the present session, and the bill passed the House some three or four weeks since. We have considered it and have reported it back and recommended its passage. I suppose, as the time is so near when we shall be compelled to proceed with hearing the matter of impeachment, I shall not have time to have the bill read this morning, but I call the attention of the Senate to it and to the fact that it is a matter of actual, clear, and most manifest justice to these persons that the bill ought to pass. It includes claims from ten dollars up to two or three thousand dollars which have been passed upon twice by the committee of the House and also twice by the Committee on Claims of the Senate. It makes an appropriation to pay these claims. I shall ask the Senate to-morrow morning, if I can get the floor, to proceed to consider the bill, because I think it right and just and fair to these parties that they should have a hearing.

WILLIAM L. MAURY.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1618) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Maury, of New York, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The chairman of the committee [Mr. EDMUNDS] has suggested that there is no objection to the bill, and it has of course been considered by the committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 4 to strike out the words "legal and," so as to read "that all political disabilities imposed," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire if that is Mr. Maury, the Naval Observatory man?

Mr. KERNAN. I understand it is not the Naval Observatory man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a nephew of his, or some relative, but it is not the Naval Observatory man.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Matthew F. Maury is the name of the person referred to by the Senator from Indiana.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2604) to incorporate the Suburban Railroad Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 2881) to authorize the establishment of a certain free public highway in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3046) to amend the law with respect to wills, to regulate the transaction of probate business in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3435) providing for the adjustment of claims against the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2427) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies," approved March 13, 1874; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1922) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. COOPER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2286.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2286) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-rooms, &c., in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have so short a time now that I think the Senator ought not to press the bill.

Mr. COOPER. It is not a purchase; it is the acceptance of a donation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does it not commit the Government for the first time to the erection of this public building?

Mr. COOPER. No, sir. We do not ask an appropriation. There is an appropriation already. This is to accept a site donated by the city. A previous law authorizes the erection of the building.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is this bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. COOPER. It is.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock and thirty minutes having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned, resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed its legislative session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. JOHN HARRIS KNOWLES, canon of Cathedral, Chicago, Illinois.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SAVINGS-BANKS—RECEIPT STAMPS.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill to the House, and recommend its passage, for the purpose of correcting what is evidently an error in the law relating to stamps upon savings-banks receipts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill, which proposed to amend the sixth section of chapter 1276 of the United States statutes, provides that so much of said section as relates to receipts of savings-banks shall be amended to read as follows:

That no stamp-tax shall be required on receipts of savings-banks or institutions for savings, having no capital stock and doing no other business than receiving deposits to be loaned or invested for the sole benefit of the parties making such deposits, without profit or compensation to the association or company.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to considering this bill at this time?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will reserve my objection or any point of order upon the bill until I have heard an explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will give some idea of the length of time that will be occupied in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Only a few minutes. The law which it is proposed to amend is one which relieves a certain class of savings-banks, where the profits go entirely to the depositors, from the stamp required upon the receipts which depositors give when they withdraw any money deposited by them in the banks. The law of the last Congress relieved savings-banks from such taxes where the receipts were in books, omitting to cover the same class of institutions where the receipts are given upon loose pieces of paper.

It is proposed by this bill, which is unanimously reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, to correct what is evidently an error in the law, so that all savings-banks where the profits inure entirely to the benefit of depositors shall be relieved from this tax of two cents upon each receipt given by the poor people who have deposits in such institutions. I am sure there can be no objection to the bill, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The two-cent stamp on all bank checks is exceedingly disagreeable to all people in the West. I will ask the gentleman my question after I shall have explained one thing. Our people are in the habit of taking everything to town in wagons, and are paid by checks or orders on the banks. Two cents is exacted of them for every separate check or order, whether for a dozen of eggs, a load of wheat, or a drove of cattle. I would inquire whether the Committee of Ways and Means intend to give relief in that direction and to take off that obnoxious tax?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] I think I violate no injunction of secrecy in saying that the Committee of Ways and Means are considering the very question to which the gentleman refers. As this, however, is a different matter, applicable solely to the correction of an error in the existing law in regard to depositors in savings-banks, I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw my objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 3471) was then received, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] what amount of money is now realized from this tax?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. We made application to the Treasury Department for that very information, and the answer, which I have here by telegraph from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was that, as these stamps were purchased outside, it was impossible to tell the exact amount received from this particular tax. I will say, however, that it cannot be much, and it is paid by the depositors in the savings institutions. I hope there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the bill, but it seems to me that we ought to be apprised of the amount that will be kept out of the Treasury by the passage of this bill. The amount received from checks on bank-stamps is very large. Although there have been many petitions for the remission of that tax, yet the amount received into the Treasury from it makes it a question of serious import.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There is a very wide distinction between the bank-check stamp in banks of discount, deposit, and issue and the stamps which are covered by this bill. The savings-banks tax is paid by the poor people who make deposits in such institutions. The other bank-check stamp is required of every one who draws a check upon a bank of discount, deposit, and issue, and yields an annual revenue of from $1,250,000 to $1,500,000. That is a different matter from the one covered by this bill. The tax is imposed upon the humble, poor depositor who goes to the savings-bank to draw $5 or $2; and he is obliged to pay the same tax as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] would pay upon a check of $100,000.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an analagous case to the bank-check stamp, which, in my judgment, ought to be repealed, in view of our large retrenchment in expenditures rendering unnecessary the longer continuance of that tax.

Mr. TUCKER. I think I may say that the Committee of Ways and Means are considering that matter, and are united in favor of the repeal of that tax.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I entirely concur with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and I have no doubt that the Committee of Ways and Means will soon report upon the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I have no objection to this bill; it is in the right direction. But I rose rather to make inquiry in regard to the amount. It cannot be very large.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. It is impossible to state it definitely.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed,

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY, ETC., OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 3472) to reduce the pay of officers of the Navy and to reduce the number of officers in the line and staff thereof; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF MARINE CORPS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, by unanimous consent, reported from the same committee a bill (H. R. No. 3473) to re-organize the Marine Corps; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, by unanimous consent, reported from the same committee a bill (H. R. No. 3474) to retain certain navy-yards and abolish others; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. HALE. I wish to have it understood that the three bills just reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and recommitted, are not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is so understood.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS OF INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask consent to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill with an amendment, and to have it put on its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it will occupy but a moment I make no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. There will be no debate. I will simply state what the bill is.

The bill (H. R. No. 2192) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances for compensation to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlement of their accounts, was read.

Mr. RANDALL. I must object to the consideration of this bill at the present time unless it comes up in regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not the regular order.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the unanimous report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection this morning to finishing up the post-office appropriation bill. These other measures can all come in afterward.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Any matter offered for reference merely, I shall not object to; but I must object to everything else.

COMPENSATION OF RAILROADS FOR MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and they are hereby, instructed to take into consideration the whole subject of compensation to railroads for mail transportation, and to report to this Congress at an early day of its second session a practicable and just plan to secure the most efficient railroad service at the least equitable cost to the Post-Office Department.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on War Claims a bill making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EDEN. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole and made a special order for Friday next, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will have to be subject also to points of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to say that two bills of which I have had charge were fixed for consideration on the 9th and 10th of this month. I would like to know when they are to come up. I am opposed to any other bills being brought up until those are disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot make a conditional objection.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If this is a proposition to give preference to bills that have been deferred or have not been reached, then I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say to the gentleman that a large number of special orders are already pending.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. The presumption is that it will come up after prior special orders.

Mr. EDEN. Friday is private-bill day, and this is in the nature of a private bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

There was no objection, and Mr. EDEN'S motion was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Banking and Currency resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York relative to silver coinage, and move their reference to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I object.

Subsequently Mr. FRANKLIN withdrew his objection, and the Committee on Banking and Currency was discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions, and they were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following resolution, and to move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the Executive Document No. 154, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, (it being the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting the deficiency estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for prior years,) as relates to the items on page 7 of said document under "War Department," "Barracks and quarters," "For hire of quarters," &c., $114,285.74, being for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, and for prior years, and recommend its reference to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

So the resolution was adopted, and the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CALIFORNIA SETTLERS.

Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3475) to confirm the title in the settlers to certain lands in California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. COOK. I move, by unanimous consent, that the bill (H. R. No. 58) reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Tuesday week next after the morning hour. It was made the special order for Thursday, March 23, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other orders, excepting the business of the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means. On March 23 it was postponed until March 29, at two o'clock p. m. On March 29 it was made the special order for Wednesday, April 5, after the morning hour. I now ask that it be made the special order for Tuesday week next after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I must interpose an objection unless appropriation bills are excepted.

Mr. COOK. They were excepted in the original order, and I am willing to consent to the gentleman's suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. RANDALL. I do unless appropriation bills are excepted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not object if appropriation bills are excepted.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is made the special order for Tuesday week after the morning hour, to the exclusion of all other business except appropriation bills.

PAINTED OR STAINED GLASS.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3476) to amend section 2505 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the importation of painted or stained glass for religious purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF PRE-EMPTORS.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands for the purpose of considering it at this time.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That whenever any pre-emptor on public lands or Indian reservations shall make satisfactory proof at the local land office, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, that the crops upon the lands occupied by him have been destroyed by grasshoppers within two years prior to the passage of this act, the time within which such pre-emptor is required to make final proof and payment is hereby extended two years.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move a concurrence in that amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' RE-UNION, CALDWELL, OHIO.

Mr. DANFORD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) granting the use of artillery, &c., to the national soldiers' re-union at Caldwell, Ohio; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to send from some convenient Government arsenal, to be used at the national soldiers' re-union at Caldwell, Ohio, at its next meeting, four pieces of artillery, and such blankets, muskets, and blank cartridges as can be spared; said cannon, blankets, and muskets to be returned after said re-union meeting.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DANFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN ROBERT C. BRAMFORD.

Mr. WALSH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3477) granting a pension to Captain Robert C. Bramford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill. And, pending that motion, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. BANNING. Before the gentleman makes that motion, I desire to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers.

Mr. HOLMAN. For recommittal?

Mr. BANNING. No, sir; for passage at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill would give rise to some debate.

Mr. BANNING. If it raises discussion, I will withdraw it. I report it now because I think there is great necessity for its passage, and I understand the Appropriation Committee have no objections to it in the shape in which it now is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some explanations in regard to it would be necessary, and it would probably give rise to discussion.

Mr. BANNING. I think it would be disposed of in two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana object to the consideration of the bill which the gentleman from Ohio desires to report?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object. I simply make my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will extend the time for debate on the pending section beyond what he has indicated in his motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well, I will satisfy my friend by saying twenty minutes.

The motion limiting debate on the pending paragraph to twenty minutes was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was also agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, being that offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the seventh section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "twenty-five" in line 20, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty," and add at the end of the section the following:

And not less than $25 per mile for roads not carrying a route agent or mail-messenger.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to withdraw that amendment and to move a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois withdrawing the pending amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for section 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

That as existing contracts or agreements with railroad companies for the transportation of mails upon their respective roads shall expire, and whenever it shall become necessary to enter into contract or make new engagements for such transportation of the United States mails upon any railroad route, the Postmaster-General shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to determine the compensation to be paid for such transportation upon the conditions and at rates not exceeding those hereinafter mentioned, to wit: That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; that suitable room, fixtures, and furniture, in cars or apartments properly lighted and warmed, and of the respective dimensions hereinafter prescribed, shall be provided, once a day each way, omitting Sundays, for route agents or railway post-office clerks to accompany and distribute the mails, or for the accommodation and transportation of mails alone on trains not accompanied by such agents or clerks, as the Postmaster-General may elect; that, on the call of the Postmaster-General, cars or apartments shall be provided of such dimensions, in excess of the amounts hereinafter prescribed, as may be necessary to meet the requirements of the service, at the rate of compensation hereinafter provided; and that the pay per annum per mile of the routes' length shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds and furnishing 72 square feet of room, $50; on routes carrying 500 pounds and furnishing 108 square feet, $75; on routes carrying 1,200 pounds and furnishing 144 square feet, $100; on routes carrying 2,000 pounds and furnishing 180 square feet, $125; on routes carrying 3,500 pounds and furnishing 225 square feet, $150; on routes carrying 5,000 pounds and furnishing 270 square feet $175; on routes carrying 7,000 pounds and furnishing 315 square feet, $200; on routes carrying 10,000 pounds and furnishing 360 square feet, $225; and $25 additional for every 5,000 pounds in excess of 10,000 pounds with 45 additional square feet for each 5,000 pounds of such excess—the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails by persons duly sworn to make correct returns of such weighing, under the supervision, if the Postmaster-General shall see proper, of an agent or agents of the Post-Office Department, for such number of successive working days not less than thirty, at such times not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result of such weighing to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided, That, in case of any deficiency of space, compared with the amounts above prescribed, deductions shall be made from the foregoing rates at the rate of $3.75 per annum per mile of the route's length for each 9 square feet once a day each way of such deficiency; and that for any excess over the amounts above prescribed which may be provided on the call of the Postmaster-General to be used for railway post-office or other postal purposes additional allowances shall be made at the rate of $3.75 per annum per mile of the route's length for each 9 square feet once a day each way of such excess: And provided further, That in case of the refusal or failure of a railroad company to comply with any call of the Postmaster-General for cars or apartments of the dimensions above prescribed or of such dimensions in excess thereof as he may deem necessary to meet the requirements of the service, the whole pay of such company for the transportation of mails shall be subject to a deduction of 25 per cent. from the foregoing rates: And provided also, That the maximum pay to any railroad company for carrying the mails shall not exceed $— per mile per annum.

With $3.75 per 9 square feet for excess of space over required complement, and deduction at same rate for deficiency of space.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I cannot hope to explain the provisions of the proposed substitute in five minutes' time with any satisfaction to myself, and certainly I cannot do it with much satisfaction to the House. I must content myself with saying that while I do not pretend to be an expert in this matter, yet I have not been an inattentive observer of the question for three years past as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. And about all I can say in regard to this substitute in five minutes is that it leaves the law as it now is as regards all railroads that carry 200 pounds of mail, and whose compensation is at the rate of $50 per mile; and also as to all railroads that carry up to 300 pounds of mail, whose compensation is at the rate of $75 a mile for the full 300 pounds. For roads carrying a weight of mail over 300 pounds the compensation by this substitute is greatly decreased from what it is under the present law, the compensation decreasing in proportion to the weight as the weight increases.

For instance, the law now is that railway companies carrying one thousand pounds of mail per annum over each mile get $100. This substitute would raise the weight to twelve hundred pounds for $100. The law now is that railways carrying fifteen hundred pounds of mail get $125. This makes them carry two thousand pounds to get that compensation. The law now is that railways carrying two thousand pounds get $150 a mile. This would make them carry thirty-five hundred pounds of mail before they can get $150.

Under the present law the railroads carry 3,500 pounds of mail for $175 per mile; my substitute requires them to carry 5,000 pounds for that sum. They now carry 5,000 pounds for $200 per mile; this proposition requires them to carry 7,000 pounds for that price. Under the present law, when the limit of 5,000 pounds of mail matter is reached, the railroads are entitled to $25 for every additional ton of mail. My proposition allows them $25 for every additional 5,000 pounds of mail over 5,000 pounds, instead of for every additional 2,000 pounds over 5,000.

The amount of car space allotted to weight by my amendment is about the same that is ordinarily allowed under the present law. But it contains a provision that if so much car space is not used the compensation shall be cut down at the rate of $3.75 for each nine square feet, or a reduction of between 5 and 6 mills per linear foot, if calculated on that basis. If more space should be necessary—that is, if two, or three, or four mail cars shall be necessary to carry the mail—the substitute provides that there shall be an increased compensation at the same rate for the extra space.

I have also incorporated in this substitute a provision that there shall be a maximum above which railroads shall not be paid. I think there ought to be such a provision as that. For instance, take the fast-mail line from New York to Chicago that runs four postal cars. Under my substitute the pay would be just about what it is now, the railroad carrying about 50,000 pounds of mail. Of course it will be well enough to put in a maximum, and I have provided for it, although I have not filled in the figures. If the substitute shall be adopted, then the figures can be filled in afterward, as the House may determine. My own opinion is that the maximum price paid per mile should be six hundred or seven hundred dollars.

From the best examination I have been able to give the subject, this proposition is the most equitable for the railroads and I think will result in a greater saving to the Government than the bill of the Committee on Appropriations. I know this is a somewhat intricate subject, and any man who attempts to explain it to the House in five minutes' time undertakes to do a vain thing. I would prefer, even to the adoption of this substitute, that the whole section be stricken out and that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads or to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is chairman, in order that they may work the matter up fully. It is a subject which involves the expenditure of from eight million to twelve million dollars a year by this Government, and should not be passed upon in a hasty manner. But if you must put it upon an appropriation bill, then I insist that this substitute is far superior to the bill of the Committee on Appropriations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit an amendment to the original text of the bill. I move to add to the pending section—section 7 of the bill—that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

But the sum paid to any railroad company for such transportation shall not exceed $600 per mile for such services for any one year.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman proposes to amend the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is to strike out and insert; I propose to amend the text before the question is taken upon striking out and inserting.

The effect of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois would be not only to perpetuate the present evil system of basing compensation upon space and weight, but, in my judgment, from a hasty reading of the substitute, it would result in an absolute increase of expenditures over the present rates. The gentleman assumes, it seems to me, in a very extraordinary manner that this measure has not been the subject of any special consideration.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all; I do not assume any such thing.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations who have been examining this subject for ten years. I have myself had the honor before the present Congress of being upon a committee that examined this subject. The question of providing reasonable rates of compensation to railroad corporations for the transportation of the mail has been the subject of very special interest. The Committee on Appropriations, aided by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is a distinguished member, and aided also by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, have spent an unusual amount of time in the investigation of this subject at the present session. Whatever information could be furnished them, either by the Post-Office Department on the one hand or by the railroad companies on the other, together with the information furnished to the Senate at the first session of the last Congress by the Committee on Transportation of that body—all this information has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations. I am surprised, therefore, that the gentleman should assume that this subject has not received due consideration from that committee.

I object to the substitute of the gentleman for two reasons: first, because it perpetuates the present evil system out of which frauds have grown, that is, the system of basing compensation upon the double standard of weight and the space occupied by the mails in the cars. The late superintendent of postal transportation by railroads makes his main point that the system of weighing the mails is necessarily attended with fraud, unless you are able to obtain absolute security in the integrity of the innumerable officers necessarily employed in the performance of that duty. I object also to the substitute because its effect will be rather to increase than to diminish the compensation to be paid to railroads for this service.

One word now in regard to my amendment. I have not offered it as coming from the Committee on Appropriations, although it has been somewhat considered by that committee and I think a majority of the members, if not all of them, think that some limitation should be imposed. Upon examining the last report of the Postmaster-General, I find that the highest pay per annum was $628, and that was paid to the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is true that in the effort to maintain a fast-mail line from New York to Chicago the expense ran up as high as $1,018 a mile; and I think the gentleman's plan would run it up as high as $1,025 per mile.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No; for fifty thousand pounds of mail matter, which is the amount now carried by the fast-mail train, the compensation under my substitute would be $675 per mile.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the highest rate per mile which would be paid under the schedule?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The highest rate named in the schedule is $1,035 per mile for 80,000 pounds of mail. The fast-mail train from New York to Chicago carries only 50,000 pounds per mile.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is safe to limit the amount paid to any one railroad company to $600 per mile. The facts which have come to the knowledge of the House since this report was made relate only to one or at the furthest to two railroad lines. According to this report the Pennsylvania Railroad, during the last fiscal year, transporting the mails with reasonable frequency and reasonable speed, received $628 per mile. I therefore think it is safe to limit the amount to be paid to any one company to the sum of $600 per mile.

I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not seek to perpetuate the present system, which has resulted in an enormous aggregate increase of expenditure for transporting our mails, running up rapidly from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000 during the present fiscal year. I think I am safe in saying to the House that on the basis of the bill of the Committee on Appropriations $8,800,000 will be a sufficient appropriation for this service. I doubt very much, however, whether it will be near the necessary amount required, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] should be adopted.

I should add that the Post-Office Department is very clear, not only in the opinion expressed by its chief, but in the opinion expressed by the late as well as the present superintendent of mail transportation, that the present system is attended with inevitable fraud; that is, the system of adopting both weight and space as the basis of compensation. You ought to take one or the other; you cannot take weight alone; but if you take space alone it furnishes the best guarantee you can have that fraud will not be perpetrated on the country. That is the judgment of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me one question. The gentleman says the Post-Office Department is against the present system of compensating railroads for carrying the mails, and I understood him to say that the Department is in favor of the system which he proposes. While I have nothing officially upon the subject and do not propose to state anything as coming officially from the Department, yet from common conversation I may say that a very considerable majority of persons having charge of this matter in the Department are by no means in favor of the scheme of the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Who are they?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not speaking officially for any person in the Post-Office Department, because they speak only through the head of the Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: the Postmaster-General says that the space basis is the true method of compensation, and that it needs no argument in its favor. That is the last communication we have from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will not dispute your official communication. You cite the Post-Office Department in favor of your plan, and I say that a majority of the persons in the Post-Office Department having charge of these matters, while they have not spoken officially, by no means favor the bill the gentleman reports, as I happen to know.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will remember that I only cited the Postmaster-General and the late and present superintendents of railroad-mail transportation. Those gentlemen have been before the Committee on Appropriations, and they all concur in the opinion that compensation by space is the fairest, the most just, and the least subject to fraud of any system that we can adopt.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me one question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is only a make-weight, I will acknowledge. Does not the gentleman know that this proposition of his to pay by space, even at the rate of 5 or 6 mills per mile, is a proposition that the great railway companies have been fighting for for years, and that they are making no opposition to it now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; let the gentleman hear me; they are asking 13 mills per mile.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly; but they make no objection even to your 5 or 6 mills per mile; they only wish to have the system adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope they will not. They are asking, however, 13 mills. Now, I am afraid the gentleman from Illinois is not in this matter as ingenuous as he usually is. He knows very well that the only reason why the railroads favored this plan was that they asked 13 mills per mile instead of 5 or 6 mills, the figures we have adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending section, and all amendments thereto, is now closed by order of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in order.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] by striking out "$600 per mile" and inserting "$500 per mile;" so as to make the maximum compensation of the railroad companies $500 a mile. I have several times called attention——

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment, but it is not now in order to debate amendments. The House instructed the Committee of the Whole to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto after twenty minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like permission for one moment to state my reason for offering the amendment. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not empowered even to ask unanimous consent for an extension of the time; but, if no member objects, the Chair will not.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the mails were carried with as much expedition and celerity up to the passage of the act of 1873 as we are likely to have them carried hereafter; and they were then carried for a maximum pay of $375 a mile. If we now allow $500, we add $125 to the pay allowed at that time. What is there in the growth of this business between 1873 and 1876 that makes it necessary to increase the maximum compensation from $375 to $600 a mile, the amount proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. Is it true that the former compensation was inadequate? I do not believe that it was. I believe that it paid the companies who carried the mails better than their freight or passenger carriage. Is it proposed to give them a mere gratuity over and above what the service is worth because they demand it? I know how difficult it is to resist the combined influences of such vast power as that of these railroad companies when legislation is to be had. I know the many forms in which those influences operate, the power of these corporations to concentrate agencies here to secure such action as suits them. But, sir, it seems to me evident without specific argument that there is no sufficient reason for increasing the compensation for carrying the mails $225 per mile within three years. The maximum amount paid prior to 1873 being, as I have stated, $375 a mile, I cannot but believe that $600 a mile is exorbitant and unreasonable. So believing, I have offered this amendment to reduce the maximum to $500 a mile, which seems to me sufficient.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw my amendment for the present. I am anxious to fix the lowest limit which is believed to be consistent with the efficiency of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has offered an amendment to the amendment; and unless that be withdrawn the amendment cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I leave my amendment pending. The result will be the same.

Mr. FOSTER. Would it be in order now to move to strike out the section?

The CHAIRMAN. Not now. There are pending two amendments to the text of the section and a substitute for the section.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REAGAN to the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, it was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN, as amended, was adopted.

The question then recurring on the substitute of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 30, noes not counted

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out the section. Mr. Chairman, it is evident——

Mr. HOLMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope I shall be allowed five minutes.

Objection was made.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. Would it be in order to move that the committee rise with the view of extending for ten or twenty minutes the time for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is always in order for the committee to rise; the Chair cannot control that; but the motion is not debatable.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope there will be no objection to allowing me to explain my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be better for the committee to rise and extend the time, inasmuch as it is contrary to the rules for the Committee of the Whole to reverse the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, debate can be extended for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the House and the committee do not thoroughly understand this question. In the first place, the committee proposed to the House the principle of compensation by space and speed, fixing the rates from 6 to 9 mills, thereby saving to the country the benefits of what is known as the fast-mail service. That was amended, and the clause in regard to 8 and 9 mills was struck out. That was again amended, and 5 and 6 mills were substituted for 6 and 7 mills. To-day in this House another amendment has been proposed, limiting the total cost to $500 a mile. The present cost of the fast-mail is $1,000 per mile, and to my certain knowledge there is not a single company that wants to do this service at the price we now give.

The effect of all this is completely to destroy all the present mail facilities. It reduces the expense of running these trains to less than $1,250 a trip—a thousand miles running at forty miles an hour carrying four cars at $1,250 a trip. This is simply impossible, and it strikes me, Mr. Chairman, the best thing we can now do is to strike out this section and refer it to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and let them examine into the matter thoroughly.

There is one point I omitted. Something has been said about railroads. I hold in my hand a letter from the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in which he takes exception to these low rates, and I shall ask to have it printed with my remarks.

The letter was read, as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Philadelphia, March 31, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: This morning I am in receipt of House bill No. 2815, as presented by Mr. STONE, of Missouri, fixing the rate of compensation for the transportation of the mails.

When the representatives of the railroad companies were before your committee they suggested that if you would make the minimum rate of speed fifteen miles per hour, with the compensation of 6 mills per linear foot—with each five miles increase of speed increasing the rate of compensation 1 mill, say to 7, 8, 9 mills, &c.—it would to a certain degree give the railways a fair rate for the service performed.

The bill as now framed fixes, on the eleventh line of the first page, the minimum rate of speed at twenty-five miles per hour, and gives a compensation of 6 mills therefor. Either this rate of speed is too high or the rate of compensation too low. I would suggest as a matter of compromise, in order that this new system may be thoroughly tried during the coming year—in which case I know it will prove so satisfactory to the Department and so valuable to the Government and the public that it will always continue—that twenty miles shall be inserted instead of twenty-five, which will cover nearly all the roads in the country except those from which the Department exacts high speed. This would make lines 11 and 12 read "at a rate of speed not exceeding twenty miles per hour, 6 mills;" lines 15 and 16, "speed exceeding twenty miles and not over twenty-five miles per hour, 7 mills;" lines 19 and 20, "speed exceeding twenty-five miles per hour and not over thirty, 8 mills;" lines 23 and 24, "speed exceeding thirty miles and over, 9 mills."

This, as you see, makes no change in the rates fixed by the bill, but simply makes a reduction of five miles in the speed.

Will not you have this change made, and oblige yours, very truly,

THOMAS A. SCOTT, President.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend knows that this is an argument in the interest of the railroads, and that is all there is about it. Every one of these matters, as he knows, has been considered fully by the committee. The gentleman has considered them himself, and the only objection he has is that it puts the rates too low.

Mr. FOSTER. And therefore destroys the mail service of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. All this discussion is out of order. The question recurs on the motion to strike out.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 77.

So the motion to strike out was disagreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move in line 20 to strike out "25" and insert "50," and at the end of the section to add, "not less than $25 per mile for roads not carrying a route agent or mail-messenger."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I think the present rate is enough. Many receive $20 a mile.

Mr. FOSTER. Only six miles long.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are three roads as low as $25.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman has gone on by unanimous consent and I ask the same courtesy. Is it not true that eight feet of space is enough to carry from two hundred to five hundred pounds, and they have cut down roads now getting from $50 to $75 to $25 and $35.

Mr. HOLMAN. Some are as low as $25.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent. of the compensation authorized by the seventh section of this act.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In order to get the question before the committee, I move to strike out section 10, which is as follows:

SEC. 10. That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent. of the compensation authorized by the seventh section of this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I doubt the wisdom of this section. The first railway which was built in this country by a land grant was the Illinois Central Railroad by a grant made to the State of Illinois and by the State to a company. At that time it was doubted whether or not the Government could compel a railroad company to carry the mail. I believe even at this time it is a matter of some doubt; at least it is a matter upon which gentlemen disagree. That being the case, I take it that the provision inserted in the act making a grant of lands to the State of Illinois was to set that question at rest, at least so far as those railroads were concerned. Whatever question other railroads might make as to whether they would carry the mails at such price as the Government should provide, these railroads could never raise any such question. I do not believe Congress contemplated at the time it made the original grant that one rate of pay should be fixed for that class of roads and another for the other class of railroads.

Well, the railroad was built across and through the prairies of Illinois, where at the time the grant was made you might travel almost for days and not find a house or a farm. The country has been developed by the construction of the road. The Government placed a price of $2.50 an acre upon the alternate sections of land, and sold what it retained for as much as the whole would bring at $1.25 per acre. More than that, the Government got customers for its lands outside of the belt granted to the State. More than that, since this grant of lands to Illinois a great and powerful Commonwealth has grown up there—the third or fourth in this Union. A State has been there developed, and that development hastened by a quarter of a century by this land grant that pays millions of dollars annually, more internal-revenue tax than any other State in the Union—last year alone over $17,600,000, and this year over $20,000,000.

That is what the land grant did, and now the gentleman from Indiana comes in here and proposes to make that railroad carry the mails at 20 per cent. less than other railroads. Now, who pays that 20 per cent. that is cut off from this road and allowed to other roads? I answer, the men who went out there as pioneers and settled up the country, took up the land, made the farms, raised the corn, built the distilleries that pay this revenue. The men that live along the line of road have to pay the rates fixed for freight and passenger carriage, and if the amount fixed by this bill for payment of railways generally for carrying the mails is only sufficient to compensate such railways for the bare cost of carrying the same, as gentlemen claim, then the cutting off of 20 per cent. from that bare cost as to the Illinois Central Railroad and other land-grant roads results in a loss of just 20 per cent. to the railroad.

Now, then, the railroad gets its revenues from carrying the mails and from transporting passengers and freight, in the main the passengers living and the freight being produced in the section of country contiguous to the railroad; so what is lost to the road in not getting the cost of mail service will of course be added by the railroad as an additional burden upon the freight and passenger traffic. To illustrate, say it actually costs per annum (for the argument) the railroad $100,000 to carry the mails, $100,000 to carry the passengers, and $100,000 to carry the freight, making a total of $300,000. By this section the railroad gets from the Government $80,000, which is a loss of $20,000, and the railroad will not only get the $100,000 by charge to passengers and $100,000 by charge on freights, but will put the $20,000 lost by carrying the mails upon the freight and passengers, which the Government should have paid. That is, the people along the line of the road will have to pay the $20,000 that all the people of the United States should pay and that all the people of the United States do pay as to all roads other than the Illinois Central Railroad and land-grant railroads.

This is a scheme of the Committee on Appropriations to tax the people that live along the Illinois Central Railroad from Chicago to Cairo and from Centralia to Dunleith more than the balance of the people of the United States are taxed, and to do it under the guise of taxing a railroad company. Why whip the devil around the stump? Why not be manly about it, and provide by a bill with a preamble reciting whereas Illinois is a great State and pays more internal revenue by millions than any other State, therefore be it enacted, &c., that the people of Illinois shall not only pay their due proportion toward transporting the mails, but shall also pay a part of the amount the people of Indiana, Massachusetts, New York, and other States should pay? Mr. Chairman, the section should be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to perfect this section before it is stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 10 the following:

Provided, That the 20 per cent. required to be retained by this section shall only be withheld after Congress shall by legislation have taken steps to prevent the said land-grant railroads from so increasing their charges as to assess the amount so withheld on the people doing business with them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The provision in this bill withholding from the land-grant railroads 20 per cent. of the amount allowed for carrying the mails, will save a large sum to the Treasury; but experience has taught citizens of the States where those roads are located that where their tariffs are restricted on one class of freight, equal or greater amounts are charged upon others. The State law of Iowa, for example, limits the charges on local transportation, but has not jurisdiction over shipments from points within the State to points outside of the State. The State does not reach either the lakes or the permanently open navigable waters of the Mississippi. Most of our shipments are to markets foreign to the State and her jurisdiction, consequently the railroads cannot be controlled in their charges on interstate commerce, and levy upon it as much as the State reduces their charges on local commerce.

Iowa has perhaps more miles of land-grant roads than any other State. The settler paid double entry for one section, the railroad company got the other. The United States Government lost nothing. The obligation of the railroad companies to carry the mails and munitions of war at a reduced cost, according to the terms of their charters, may be the most binding, but in the light of our experience in Iowa with these companies, I see very clearly that what is saved to all the people by this provision will be paid by the patrons of the roads living along them.

I think gentlemen will not fail to see the great injustice this legislation would inflict upon the most deserving class of American citizens. They have invoked the aid of Congress to remedy evils and correct abuses that have grown up with the growth of the corporations that carry the mails and transport to market the enormous surplus required in the East and shipped abroad. They have asked Congress to prevent extortion and discrimination where State law cannot reach, and so far their petitions have been denied. It has never entered the minds of any of them that they were to be selected as proper subjects of additional taxation. It is true the fertile acres of the Northwest yield abundantly. The States comprising this section are the most prosperous of any in the Union, but surely this House will hesitate even indirectly to lay heavier burdens upon the broad shoulders or fetter the strong arms or discourage the stout hearts that have made States out of the storm-swept prairies and garnished them with the accompaniments of civilized and enlightened life.

If you will go a step farther and prevent the large sum of money proposed to be saved to the Treasury from being assessed upon the people who are tributary to the land-grant roads, the controversy arising out of the legislation will be between the corporations and the Government; but if the corporations are permitted to exact the amount from the people that is to be saved by this clause to the General Government, the retrenchment of expenses affected in this case may be matter of satisfaction to some sections of the country, but will be bitter legislation for my constituents, who are tributary to two of these roads.

It seems that this House is anxious to investigate every Department of the Government, every individual connected with it, every interest with which our people are connected, except that of transportation, no matter in what shape this subject comes before this House, whether on call of the States, or on leave for unanimous consent, a majority in the one case or an individual in the other is ready to choke off favorable action.

The great producing Northwest is the plaything of a very few men who control our railroad system; combinations raise and depress rates at pleasure. This House while it refuses to consider this great and overshadowing question directly, must not indirectly add new burdens by placing part of the expenses of the Post-Office Department on us that should be borne by the general Treasury.

Now I want to call attention to one thing more while I am on my feet. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] the other day made these remarks, which I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 13:

> How much have the people of the West paid for those railroads? As a matter of general fact, not one dollar. What the Government has not done capitalists have done, and by that aid they have got now in their hands those means of communication which will give them now or hereafter, if wise and just, the absolute control of the Government without the cost of a dollar to the people of the particular localities where the roads are established.

Sir, let me tell you something about what the people of the West have done to help build their railroads. Almost every man interested has contributed. Every village, town, and city has contributed. The State of Iowa permitted townships to tax themselves 5 per cent. to build these railroads.

Counties voted bonds upon themselves to the extent of $100,000 in some cases to help construct railroads. It has been carefully estimated by competent men that perhaps 20 per cent. of the total cost of all the railroads was contributed by the people living along the line, who do not receive any benefit at all in the way of stocks of the roads. It is therefore clear, having paid for the lands granted to the roads and paying liberally in donations, any action the General Government may take toward reducing the pay given for carrying the mails must not be at their expense.

And I want to say one thing more, for the benefit of those gentlemen who tell us here that they have bought stock in western railroads which have defaulted in the payment of interest and they have lost their money, that not one dollar was ever carefully invested in a railroad in Iowa that did not make a return of a reasonable amount of interest. The people are not responsible for all the bonds that may have been issued.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. This opposition to this paragraph is not unexpected. I have never known a measure brought before this House proposing to compel justice at the hands of railroad corporations that they did not appear upon this floor in pretty strong force. I understand that pretense of exempting the people of Illinois and of Iowa from taxation; I understand that very well; I have heard it before. I heard it when we attempted to impose taxes upon these land-grant railroads for the support of the Federal Government in the hour of its peril.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] if, when the people of Iowa imposed taxes upon the railroad land-grant corporations, they added a clause that imposed such restrictions upon the charges made by the railroad corporations as that they should not add the taxes imposed by the State to the cost of transporting passengers and freight in the State?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman by asking how the people of Iowa can prevent this money, which will be withheld under the tenth section of this bill, from being assessed on the transportation of their persons and property?

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that when they imposed taxes in Iowa upon these railroad corporations they added a clause providing that such taxes should not be added to the cost of transporting passengers and freight?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not remember about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought not; I saw the fallacy of the gentleman's argument at once. And yet he lives in a State that imposes a pretty heavy tax on railroad corporations, and yet they never dreamed of putting in a restriction.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must excuse me. He must bear in mind that every act of past Congresses making these grants of land to railroads contained, as a condition of the grant, the right of Congress to regulate the cost of transporting the mails, for the reason that it was considered but fair and proper that the value of those grants should be taken into consideration when fixing the compensation of railroads for transporting the mails.

In the Illinois Central Railroad bill you had a clause requiring that road to transport the supplies and troops of the Government free of charge. Yet that company obtained $3,500,000 from the public Treasury in the hour of this nation's peril for the transportation of the troops and supplies of the Government, and up to this time every effort has been insufficient to secure the refunding of that amount. That corporation was more than built by your munificent land grant; it is the wealthiest corporation in this country, built up by your munificence, and it is the last corporation that should come into this House and protest against carrying the mails at a fair and reasonable rate. We propose to pay the land-grant railroads what it is worth to convey the mails, but not a profit. It is the refusal to give them a profit on the transportation of the mails that excites the indignation of such corporations as the Illinois Central Railroad. That railroad has $3,500,000 of the public money in its treasury wrongfully obtained during the period of war.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Allow me one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to the gentleman moving to add to this section a provision that the one-fifth deducted from the cost of transporting the mails by the land-grant railroad companies shall not be added by them to the cost of transporting persons and freight in the various States of this Union. But the amendment of the gentleman as now offered is so drawn up as to simply defeat this provision of the bill, for he makes it depend upon future legislation of Congress; and how soon that legislation can be effected no one can tell. His State can very readily apply the remedy, and say that no such addition shall be made, for that is under State control.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for one minute?

Mr. FORT. I will do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is no quarrel between me and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] upon this section. The people have asked and asked repeatedly, through every avenue by which they can reach Congress, that steps should be taken to prevent extortion and discrimination by railroads in interstate commerce. We passed a bill to that effect in the last Congress. I offered resolutions in this House to have the subject considered, and they were kicked out contemptuously. The gentleman now proposes to put a burden on my constituents that the Legislature of the State of Iowa cannot relieve them from. I only ask that it be not done until such time as this Congress, the only power in the country that can protect the people in this matter, shall have done it. This is the only difference between us.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the railroad corporations of Iowa add to the cost of transportation all the taxes we impose upon them?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The people of Iowa are not able to prevent any tax levied by Congress from being assessed on interstate commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman this question, When we tax these railroad corporations, do they add that tax to the cost of transporting passengers and freight?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The States can regulate everything in regard to State commerce; but the gentleman knows very well that they cannot regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will gladly join with the gentleman in restraining the cupidity of these corporations; but when he attempts to defeat a proper measure of regulation of these railroad corporations as to the amount they shall charge for transporting the mails, then I think he goes far beyond his duty in this respect. He should seek to accomplish both purposes, instead of defeating both.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Just one word in conclusion. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is a prominent man in this House. This is a democratic House. I have no influence here to secure protection for my people. I say that he and other gentlemen who have influence on that side must not put weights of this kind upon us before they make it possible, through some machinery, for our constituents to be protected.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend and his political associates had control of this House many years. Why did they not pass such a measure as he indicates?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We did pass a bill here in this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it was passed by democratic votes. Why did it not pass in the other branch of Congress?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not a member of the Senate, and never was.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to defend the Illinois Central Railroad Company, although both branches of that road pass through my district; nor do I wish to defend any other railroad corporation. We generally find that those corporations can defend themselves. But I do think that my friend from Indiana in what he has said has, unintentionally no doubt, misstated the facts in speaking of the Illinois Central Railroad Company as having demanded and received $3,000,000 for transporting troops and munitions of war during the late war. It may be true that that railroad company has been paid $3,000,000; but for what? Does the gentleman claim that, although it is stipulated in the law that they shall transport troops and munitions of war free, the company was bound to furnish its cars, its men, its oil, and to do all this work for nothing during the four years of the continuance of the war? Of course that is unreasonable. But the gentleman knows, as does every one who has investigated the subject, that the Illinois Central Railroad Company did not get as much for transporting troops, &c., as other companies received. This company was paid for service, for the men it employed, for the oil and coal it burned, not for the use of its road. The gentleman from Indiana should not mislead the House in this regard.

So far as regards his claim that this railroad company should now transport the mails cheaper than others I am with him if he can saddle the difference upon the road. But there is the difficulty. As has been well asked by my colleague [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] can this company be compelled to bear this burden and not saddle it on us? If the gentleman will devise some means by which that railroad company will be compelled to carry these mails for 80 per cent. of the ordinary compensation and not charge the remaining 20 per cent. upon those who happen to live along their line, then, of course, I would be disposed to support his proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. But one word, and I shall then ask the House to close debate on this paragraph. My friend from Illinois is mistaken simply in this: The law making the grant to the Illinois Central Railroad Company contained this provision: "The said road shall be a public highway for the transportation of the troops and supplies of the United States, free of toll or other charge;" yet that company, taking advantage of the peril of the Government in the years 1862, 1863, and 1864, received from the Treasury over $3,000,000. On two occasions, upon the motion of a distinguished citizen of that State, who like a man stood by the people of Illinois and of this country in their hour of peril, this House incorporated upon an appropriation bill a provision instructing the Attorney-General to bring suit to compel that corporation to disgorge that money. But that measure was twice defeated in the Senate; and the gentleman understands as well as myself the agencies through which that measure was defeated.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman claim that the Illinois Central Railroad Company ought to have transported troops and supplies free during all that time?

Mr. HOLMAN. By every reasonable interpretation of the law, by the language used in the debates at the time the bill was passed, and by the nature of the corporation, that company was bound to transport the troops and supplies of the Government free from toll or other charge.

Does the gentleman want me to go into the history of that transaction? Does he not know that the recital of the conduct of every man connected with the Illinois Central Railroad, as well as of other corporations which received munificent grants from the Government, would make every citizen blush with shame—I mean their selfish conduct in the hour of the nation's peril. I have but this to say, that we propose to pay these railroad corporations what it will cost to transport the mails. We do not propose that roads built by our munificence shall reap a large profit from the transportation of the mails. Gentlemen attempt to shield these railroads under the pretense they are sheltering the citizens of the State. It is a far-fetched argument and will not answer. The object of the amendment is to put these land-grant railroads upon the same footing with the others. We literally built those land-grant railroads, and we propose to pay them what it costs to transport the mails.

I ask by unanimous consent that all further debate on this paragraph terminate in five minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Say ten minutes and I will not object. My colleague wants five minutes, and I also want five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless that is agreed to I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana cannot make his attack by innuendo and then refuse to permit reply by cutting off debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to allow five minutes, and to give the gentleman that five minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But my colleague also wants five minutes. Say ten minutes and I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to debate being closed on this paragraph in five minutes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced concurrence in amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 679) relating to interments in the Congressional Cemetery.

It further announced the passage of the following bills, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3136) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1618) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Maury, of New York.

It further announced the passage without amendment of a bill (H. R. No. 2286) to further provide for the building of a custom-house and post-office, court-rooms, &c., in the city of Memphis, Tennessee.

The committee then resumed its session.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There is no necessity of the committee rising if the gentleman will only agree to close all debate in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think five minutes is enough.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object, unless we have ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the demand for ten minutes, and will divide that time with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing debate on the pending paragraph in ten minutes?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now withdraw my amendment in order that the gentleman whose time I took may renew it.

Mr. FORT. I renew the amendment.

The gentleman from Indiana in his zeal, I think, misrepresents the true state of the facts which transpired during the late war. He knows, and if he does not any gentleman of the House can soon learn the fact, that there were months during that time when the Government monopolized every single freight-car on the Illinois Central Railroad, and would not allow a citizen a single car for the transportation of his corn, or oats, or wheat. The Government took possession of every one of them, and every freight-car for months was employed in Government transportation. The gentleman under the law certainly will not claim this railroad was compelled to render all the service it could perform to the Government free of charge. How, then, could the company pay its men? How could the company pay its expenses? Such a demand is utterly unreasonable. The emergency which then arose was unlooked for. Nothing of the sort was or could have been foreseen when the building of the railroad was undertaken under the land grant made to the State of Illinois.

There were times when the road was entirely under the control of the Government—completely monopolized by the Government. There were times when even passengers were not taken over the road. The transportation of troops and munitions of war and supplies occupied the entire road for months, and for months nothing else could be done upon it. This is well known to men who lived along the line of the road. It is known that men were broken up who had purchased grain, and corn, and other supplies, and desired to get them to market, but could not do so for months simply because the use of the road was monopolized exclusively by the Government.

Now, sir, let me get back to the question which we have here. I say to the gentleman from Indiana if he can compel the Illinois Central Railroad to do this service for 80 per cent., all right; but he cannot do it. The gentleman may say that he will pay them but 80 per cent.; but we must make up the other 20. He says that the Government built the Illinois Central Railroad. I will confess that the land grant was the occasion of the building of that road. But what did the Government lose? As has been stated, they got $2.50 per acre for every other section, and much of it was sold for $5 and some for $10 an acre. The records of the Department will show that the Government got more money for their alternate sections than they would have got for the whole of their land if they had sold it for $1.25 per acre. It was a benefit to the Government, it was a benefit to the railroad company, it was a benefit to the people of the State of Illinois. It benefited that country, and brought it forward faster than would have been the case otherwise.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana so far has failed to show us how we can compel the Illinois Central Railway Company to bear this burden. The people of some other country, perhaps of the East, perhaps of England, have built the Illinois Central Railroad as they have built other railroads in the West, and I say that in all fairness they are entitled to their dividends. We are not to suppose that they were persons so disinterested, so benevolent, as to contribute their means to make improvements for us without the possibility of making profit for themselves; and I say when they have a chance of making a profit they are entitled to it. And it is little less than repudiation for us to turn upon them and say you shall not make a reasonable profit on your investments. I think all such arguments as that should go for nothing; it certainly is not becoming for gentlemen on this floor to insist upon them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Then there will be two speeches on the same side, instead of one for and the other against.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] allowed ten minutes to the other side on this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not intend to allow the whole of the last five minutes to go to the other side.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. After I have had to beg ten minutes of the gentleman, he wishes to take back part of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hold in my hand the original land-grant act making this grant to Illinois and other States. In its fourth section it provides—

That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof, for the purposes aforesaid and no other; and the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

That is one section. Then the sixth section provides—

That the United States mail shall at all times be transported on the said railroad under the direction of the Post-Office Department—at such price as the Congress may by law direct.

Not free, but—

Now, it is not necessary to discuss the first section I have read. It has been discussed in this House years ago, long before I had the honor to be a member of Congress. Some gentlemen say that the railway company ought to have done all the transportation free of charge for the Government and furnished the rolling-stock and employés without charge. Others say the company was only bound to let the Government have the use of the track, &c., without charge. I do not know which is the proper legal construction of the act. That was settled by a former Congress, at least for the time being. If, however, the gentleman from Indiana should see proper to introduce a resolution instructing the Attorney-General to bring suit against the company for the recovery of amounts paid by the Government to that road for transportation, let him do so; and if it passes, then the courts can pass upon the question. But the gentleman comes with this other proposition. It is not right that he should go back and drag in this old matter as a make-weight to carry his unjust and improper proposition in reference to the question now pending. The rights of the Government as to the transportation of the mails under the section last quoted are very different from its rights under the first section quoted.

O, yes; the gentleman is very astute; he is very good at argument and is very good at subterfuge. If he can only introduce some proposition under the pretext of economy and mix it up with something that happened years before that was done wrong, as he alleges, so as thereby to pull his measure through right, not upon its merits, but upon a matter arising under an entirely different section of the law, then he is all right, and I suppose he calls this kind of thing statesmanship.

Let me allude to another point in this connection. The gentleman from Indiana says he wants to compel those land-grant railroad companies to carry these mails for what the work is worth, and not to give a large profit to them for carrying the mails, therefore he cuts them down 20 per cent. below other roads. O! I thought the gentleman contended that his bill here was only paying the railroad companies generally the mere cost of carrying the mails. He blows hot out of one corner of his mouth one minute, and the very next minute he blows cold, and says that 80 per cent. of the amount he proposes to allow to the railroad companies of the United States is a fair compensation for carrying the mails and the other 20 per cent. is a large profit. That is the gentleman's consistency. I wish he would hang together for ten minutes upon some proposition or other in reference to this matter. First it is very cheap; first it is bare cost; first it is low enough for all the railroad companies of the United States; and the next minute 80 per cent. is enough and covers the cost, and he does not want to pay more than the cost to these railroad companies for carrying the mails.

The right way and the fair way is not to deceive or impose upon anybody. It would be the part of statesmanship to examine the law itself and the circumstances under which it passed to ascertain what it meant, and after you have done that, do what is right about it and quit trying to cheat somebody; when I say cheat somebody, I mean trying to deceive somebody; in other words, trying to drag through an unjust bill in the interest of the great railways to pay them for carrying the mails that will cost the Government millions of money more than the present system, and then diverting the attention of the people from the unjust features of this bill by saying we pay those land-grant companies 20 per cent. less than other companies. I appeal to the future, should this bill become law, to say who is right, the gentleman from Indiana or myself. I appeal to the intelligent judgment of the future to decide who is standing here and advocating legislation in the interest of railroad companies, the gentleman from Indiana or myself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may have five minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not ask for five minutes; you gentlemen on the other side have had all the time you desire.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from California seems to find it convenient to object at all times.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from California will object whenever he feels like it.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa; and on a division there were ayes 29, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, to strike out the tenth section of the bill; and on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 67.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for tellers, as no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported ayes 36, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 4017 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4017. The Postmaster-General may employ such a number of special agents as the good of the service and the safety of the mail may require. Such agents shall be paid a salary at the rate of not more than $1,600 a year each; and they shall be allowed, on proper vouchers, for living and incidental expenses actually incurred while traveling and absent from their headquarters in the discharge of their official duties, not exceeding $5 a day: Provided, That in the employment of such special agents the appropriation made in the first section of this act for mail depredations and special agents shall not be exceeded."

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out that section. I believe that the only difference between that section and the law as it now stands is in regard to the manner in which these special agents shall be paid. Under the present system they are allowed a per diem. This proposition is that these expenses shall be paid by vouchers. Now, this is a special agency—a detective service to a certain extent—and I think every gentleman must see how difficult and embarrassing it must be for the special agent to be compelled to take vouchers for the expenses he incurs. Under the present system the management of this branch of the service is perhaps superior to anything we have ever had. It is sustained in the present form by the Postmaster-General and by the head of the special agents, and I think it would be a mistake to compel special agents to take vouchers. They have to travel under cover—sometimes under two names—and it will be seen how difficult it will be to take vouchers for their expenses. The present system, in my judgment, is the most correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is mistaken as to the effect of this provision. Its object is to limit the allowance to the special agents employed by the Post-Office Department. Under the existing law they get a salary of $1,600 and I believe $5 a day for expenses during the entire year, making a very large salary, as my friend will observe. The object of this change of the law is to pay them the same salary, $1,600 a year, and to pay them in addition to that their actual expenses incurred in traveling while on service. Under the present law these agents while stationed here at headquarters receive $5 a day for expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. Not all of them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand they all do.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of them get only $3 and some $4 a day.

Mr. HOLMAN. The object of this provision is to pay them extra compensation whenever they are actually employed. My friend does not believe that it is true policy to pay them per diem expenses, largely increasing their salaries. Rather than do that, the present salary of $1,600 should be largely increased. The salary should be a specific sum. The object of this provision is to pay the same salary, but only actual expenses while on duty, and the voucher required is not the voucher of railroad companies or hotel-keepers, but of the agent himself. He makes out his own account, and there is no embarrassment about it.

I am quite confident that my friend ought not to press this motion. I will say further that this section was not only adopted by the Committee on Appropriations but was very carefully prepared by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I have only one word to say in answer to the gentleman. This allowance of three, four, or five dollars a day for expenses is not considered as an increase of salary. The allowance is made to cover the expenses of these agents, and the Department find it is better to make an allowance of so much money than to pay on vouchers. I think perhaps that the Department of the Interior works on the other principle in relation to this matter, but it is true that this special service in the Post-Office Department is superior to any such service in the country. The present head of it and the Postmaster-General desire the retention of the present system, not because it increases salary, but they prefer the present mode of paying expenses.

The question was taken upon Mr. FOSTER's amendment to strike out the twelfth section, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 4020 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4020. The Postmaster-General may appoint one special agent as superintendent of the railway-postal service at a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, and not to exceed six special agents as assistant superintendents of the railway-postal service at a salary at the rate of $1,600 a year each; and the superintendent and assistant superintendents shall receive such additional allowances only as are provided for by section 4017, which allowances, together with their salaries, shall be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail; and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department shall charge to the appropriation for the free-delivery system the salary and allowances made to one special agent who may be detailed for that service; and the salary and allowances made to not exceeding five special agents who may be detailed for employment in the money-order service shall be paid out of the proceeds of that service: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the temporary detail of any special agent in the employment of the Post-Office Department for special agent's duty in connection with any branch of the postal service in cases of emergency."

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out section 13. This provision is offered in lieu of the present provision, which provides for two special agents and ten assistants. The purpose of it is to throw out of employment the special agent of depredations and to reduce the number of assistants by four. As I said before, there is no special agency service in this country, nor has there ever been one that began to equal in efficiency the present special agency service of the Post-Office Department. The existing force is composed of two special agents, one of whom has charge of the railway-mail service and the other has charge of depredations. There are ten assistants at present, and those ten are located one at Boston, one at New York, one at Washington, one at Atlanta, one at Saint Louis, one at Toledo, one at San Francisco, and one at large.

The present force have each in charge 7,500 miles of railroad, of 27,000 miles each of interior transportation, and an average of over 4,000 miles of postal mail service each. If the proposition of the committee is adopted, it will simply double the duties of these men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the chief of mail depredations is concerned, I hold in my hand a tabular statement prepared by the chief showing the operation of the service in that Department during the past year, which I incorporate as a part of my remarks.

I undertake to say that if the provision proposed by the committee is adopted it will very seriously embarrass the operation of the Department.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. Under section 12 of the bill how could the service be embarrassed when the Postmaster-General has the right to appoint any officer of his Department as a special agent?

Mr. FOSTER. He has, but we have reduced his force 20 per cent. and the amount of the appropriation 50 per cent.

The opinion of that officer, who has been complimented time and again by gentlemen upon the other side—and he deserves compliments for his efficiency and ability—is that this provision will materially cripple the service.

Mr. STONE. I did not hear the opening remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] but I did hear him say that this provision will cripple the service of the Post-Office Department. It may be that it will cripple the service of the Department if he wants to continue the enormous salaries paid to these special agents. These special agents have a salary of $1,600, and receive in addition $5 a day for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year.

Mr. FOSTER. That is for expenses.

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon; it is not for expenses. I have here a statement from the Postmaster-General himself, giving salary, per diem, and incidental expenses of each of these special agents.

Mr. FOSTER. All I have to say is that if the salary is too large reduce it, but do not reduce the numbers.

Mr. STONE. The salary is just and right. The salaries for the year ending June 30, 1875, amounted to $87,481.31; the per diem amounted to $31,840.50. All I object to is the allowance of $5 a day for each day in the year.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may understand this question better than I do; but I understand that the $5 a day is paid for expenses and that the sixty-one thousand and odd dollars is for expenses.

Mr. STONE. It is paid directly to them as a per diem, regardless of whether they incur any expense or not, and amounts to $1,825 each, which with the salary of $1,600 aggregates $3,425 per annum, and is not contemplated, as I claim, under existing laws.

Mr. WAIT. It strikes me that it would be most unfortunate legislation to change the law as it now stands and adopt the amendment proposed by the committee. Gentlemen know that the head of this department of the service has been there for years. He is a gentleman remarkably adapted to perform the very onerous duties of his position. He is a very intelligent man, and his men are trained to perform their duties. If you reduce his force you virtually strike a blow at that service which will destroy its efficiency. Under the existing law there are two special superintendents of the postal-mail service. How has he arranged it? He has placed one of these special agents in charge of the contract postal-mail service, and that gentleman discharges his duties as he should do and as I know he does and is entirely occupied in the performance of the duties assigned to him. Now, the other gentleman, let me say, requires the aid of every man on his force. They are not ordinary employés of the Post-Office Department; but trained to their positions they have been advanced by merit, and occupying connections with the Post-Office Department relatively the same positions that an intelligent detective force in one of our large cities occupies in relation to the regular police force of the city. Now, ought not men of that class, selected on account of their intelligence and advance, on account of their experience, be fully compensated? The present salary, as I look at it, is smaller than they should receive, and the extra allowance is expended for their traveling expenses. Break down this force and what will be the effect of it? The effect of it will be that the head of the Department will be deprived of the means of convicting and breaking down that class of men who are a nuisance to the community by sending through the mails licentious literature and debauching the people of the country.

Let me say to the chairman of the committee that I do not believe the great body of the American people would not regard this as a blow struck at the very vitals of this system. I know the gentleman who is at the head of this Department intimately; I know him personally; I know his ability; and I know it would be a serious public calamity to have the influence of that officer decreased or destroyed.

Mr. STONE. I desire to correct one statement made by the gentleman from Connecticut. I do not propose to reduce the number of employés under the superintendent of the mail service, nor will I detract from the merits of any gentleman connected with the railroad mail service; but if the gentleman will take the roster of the Post-Office Department for 1876 he will find that the Postmaster-General has placed one of the superintendents of railroad mail service as chief of the special agents, and not superintendent of the railroad service. I have no objection to the salaries paid to these agents, but I do protest against their being paid $5 a day while they are doing duty at headquarters; but when they are ordered away they ought to be paid their expenses, as it will be found they are whenever traveling on business of the Department.

Mr. WAIT. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Missouri. If I understand him, the Postmaster-General has appointed an officer and clothed him with powers with which he had no authority to clothe him. I think the law is entitled to a liberal construction, and when I point out the evils which it is the duty of this officer to protect the country against, I say that the law should have that construction, and should not be construed like a criminal law. This gentleman is charged with the protection of the mails of the country, not only against preventing persons from stealing money out of letters, but to prevent the using the mails to befoul the public mind, by which the American people are shocked. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was taken upon striking out the section; and on a division there were ayes 38, noes not counted; so the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

SEC. 14. That no post-office or service on any mail-route necessary for the public service, and required for the proper and efficient distribution of the mails, shall be discontinued.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to strike out that section. This bill is absurd enough without this provision; we have stricken down fast-mail trains; we have decreased the mail facilities of the people, and now we propose to compel the Postmaster-General to create deficiencies. It strikes me that there was absurdity enough in this bill without this provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a vote.

The question was taken on Mr. FOSTER's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to strike out section 14 and to insert in lieu that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no post-office or service on any mail-route now in existence or established by the present Congress shall be suspended or discontinued by the Postmaster-General on account of the amount herein appropriated.

Mr. DIBRELL. The object of my amendment is to protect the star routes, as they are called, and the small post-offices. Much has been said in the discussion of this bill in the interest of railroads and of post-office accommodations in the large cities. But not a word has been said in defense of the star routes, and the small post-offices in the interior of the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been made by this House an unanswerable argument in favor of the star routes. In other words, we have appropriated for the star routes and steamboat service $600,000 more in this bill than was expended for that service in the last fiscal year. There was therefore no necessity for making any other argument in favor of the star routes. Yet my friend from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] is apprehensive that the star routes will suffer; I think they are safe enough.

Mr. DIBRELL. My amendment, then, will do them no harm.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that the star routes do not need any protection. How are they established? Any one of my constituents, or of the constituents of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] sends a communication to us asking for the establishment of a new route. We slip the memorandum into the little box at the Clerk's desk, it goes to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the new route is incorporated in the annual post-route bill. Neither the gentleman nor myself ever thinks of examining the matter. Sixty per cent. more routes have been established at each session of Congress than service is put on. If every new route provided for in the post-route bill had to pass the examination of the member of Congress in whose district it is established, it would impose a very heavy duty upon members of Congress. I do not think that any of us ever considers the question of the necessity of these new routes. It is convenient to have them established. We have them on every road in the country. Nearly every turnpike road in the United States is a post-route. Sometimes a railroad runs right along by the side of the turnpike, and would my friend require that the mail should be carried upon the turnpike road, with a railroad running by the side of it?

The Ohio River at one time was a post-route established by law; but railroads have now been built on both sides of the river, running between the principal cities, and the mail service on the river itself has now been discontinued as unnecessary. I think the amendment of the gentleman is unnecessary. The language used by the committee in this section accomplishes all that my friend says he desires to accomplish by his amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend by striking out the last word, for the purpose of expressing my entire approbation of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL.] It is just such a provision as should be adopted. The gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. HOLMAN] must see the utter worthlessness of all the new post-routes established by this Congress if no appropriation is to be made for them, or no provision passed by which a deficiency can be hereafter appropriated to put service on those routes. There have been several new routes established in almost every congressional district in the United States. What is the use of establishing these post-routes if there is to be no service upon them? And how can service be put upon them unless the Committee on Appropriations will allow a sufficient appropriation to defray the expenses?

If I apply at the Post-Office Department for an increase of service on any route, I am all the time met by the declaration that there is no appropriation for that purpose. When I ask that a new post-office be established where the postmaster would get only $12 or $15 a year, but the office is needed for the convenience of the neighborhood so that they may not be obliged to go fifteen or twenty miles for their mails, the Postmaster-General tells me that there is no appropriation for the purpose and he will not establish the office. I understand that this amendment covers such cases as these. In order that the committee may understand exactly the condition in which many localities of this country are placed, I ask the Clerk to read a letter which I have received from the Post-Office Department in confirmation of what I have said. I hope that letter will make some impression upon the gentleman in charge of this bill, if my remarks fail to do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, APPOINTMENT OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1876.

SIR: The application of your correspondent, * * * of Stanford, Kentucky, for the establishment of a post-office at Cumberland Falls, Whitley County, Kentucky, submitted with your indorsement of the 21st instant, is received.

In reply thereto, I have to say that in consequence of the uncertainty of congressional legislation in regard to the appropriation for postal purposes for the year 1877, the Postmaster-General is constrained to decide against the establishment of any additional post-offices at this time.

In order that the case may be prepared for future consideration, the usual letter of interrogatories as to locality, the population to be supplied, &c., has this day been sent to * * * the person recommended for postmaster, to the care of the postmaster at Young's Creek, Whitley County, Kentucky.

I am, sir, respectfully, &c.,

J. W. MARSHALL,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN D. WHITE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WHITE. As the First Assistant Postmaster-General writes me in regard to establishing new post-offices, so the Second Assistant Postmaster General will write to every member with regard to putting service upon these new post-routes. He will tell them that there is not a sufficient appropriation for the purpose. I would like to know what is the use of establishing post-routes, if you do not put service upon them? Does the gentleman in charge of this bill imagine that he is serving the people of this country by refusing to give them mail facilities? If he thinks so, I can tell him that he is mistaken. If I understand the wants of the people of this country, what they most desire is intelligence, above all things mail facilities by which they can speedily communicate with all parts of the country. It may serve the purpose of the party in power to keep the people in darkness during the campaign that is now approaching, but it will not do for all time; it will not do for the coming years. I beseech the gentleman having charge of this bill, as I do the entire committee, to make a sufficient appropriation to cover all the necessary expenses of this Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. WHITE. I suggest that several million dollars be added to the amount proposed in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The young gentleman from Kentucky ought to say to his people that this House has appropriated $600,000 more for this service than was expended last year.

Mr. WHITE. That is not a sufficient answer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not answering the gentleman at all. But he should tell his constituents that at the time of the writing of this letter—a sort of letter which I have been receiving for sixteen years from the Post-Office Department, but with which I never troubled the House or occupied the space of the Congressional Globe or RECORD—at the time this letter was written this House was adding $600,000 more for the star-route service than was expended last year, and a larger sum for this particular service than was ever appropriated by Congress.

If the First Assistant Postmaster-General intends to say to the country that this House is embarrassing the proper administration of the Post-Office Department, he makes a statement that is not sustained by the records of this House. It does not become an officer of the Post-Office Department to pretend that Congress will not make the necessary appropriations. This letter is in one of its features very remarkable; different in temper and spirit from any that I have ever known to emanate from the Post-Office Department. I have received a great many statements from the Post-Office Department in regard to the establishment of post-offices and mail service.

Mr. WHITE. Did I not understand the gentleman to say that he had received just such letters from the Post-Office Department for sixteen years?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must excuse me. I have received a great many letters from the Post-Office Department during the last sixteen years, stating embarrassments in the way of establishing post-offices. Such things are proper enough. But to intimate an apprehension that Congress will not make the proper appropriations to sustain one of the Departments of the Government is unauthorized and unwarranted. Such an intimation comes with very poor grace from one of those Departments, particularly when at the very time the letter seems to have been written we were appropriating a larger sum for this specific service than has ever before been appropriated; for gentlemen must remember that we are now appropriating definitely for the star-route service $6,800,000, though only $6,100,000 has been expended for such service during the last fiscal year.

I am sorry to say a word in regard to the Post-Office Department that is not kind and complimentary; for in the main I am pleased with the administration of that Department, but a letter of this temper, emanating from the head or a leading official of a Department and reflecting upon the intentions of Congress in regard to the proper support of one of the great Departments of the Government, I have never before heard read in this House, no matter what party was in power.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out the last word. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the last word is the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky already pending.

Mr. WHITE. I move then to strike out the next to the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky to make a formal amendment, which he has done; and he has occupied five minutes in discussing it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] occupied five minutes in opposing it. Therefore, the Chair held that debate on the formal amendment was exhausted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word; and yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion now pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky is anxious to be heard, I will withdraw the amendment that he may renew it. But I think we are consuming a great deal of time unnecessarily over this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

The question being taken on the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, it was not agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and also the gentleman from Ohio, for their courtesy and kindness. I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana. He knows very well that I have voted in this House for every measure of retrenchment and reform proposed by the majority of the House that has been warranted by reason or by ordinary common sense. But whenever it is proposed to restrict mail facilities I must refuse to go with this majority. If I understand the temper of the American people, they not only wish but demand that they shall have first-rate mail facilities. The amount proposed by the committee to be appropriated is inadequate. We are told by the Postmaster-General, as well as by numbers of members on this floor, that it will not be sufficient.

The gentleman from Indiana objects to the letter which has been read from the First Assistant Postmaster-General. I appeal to the common sense of this House and the country at large whether that letter is not warranted by the "retrenchment and reform," so called, which has been attempted in this House all winter, and which is recognized in this House and all over the country as mere political clap-trap. Now I object seriously to any effort at retrenchment and reform which is calculated to restrict at present or in the future any privileges now enjoyed by the American people in regard to mail facilities.

Mr. HOLMAN. What measure of reform have you voted for at this session?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana asks me what measure of reform I have voted for this winter. I ask the gentleman to look at the RECORD and see if he can what I have not voted for in the interest of retrenchment and reform. I think I went as far as the farthest in regard to the Military Academy appropriation bill. In my judgment I then threw out a suggestion to the House which at some future day I am sure will be adopted, and that is to limit this unwieldy body to two hundred members, thereby effecting a considerable retrenchment and most justifiable at this time. I also voted for the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I do not know what other measures of reform and economy which have been proposed I did not vote for. If there are any, let the gentleman state them. I think I should be safe in referring the gentleman to the RECORD to see whether I have not voted for every measure of retrenchment and reform which has been proposed warranted by common sense. I will not vote for this one because it is not warranted by common sense or reason.

The people of the country demand better mail facilities than they have, and not to have the present mail facilities cut down. I ask this committee to make sufficient appropriation to defray all the expenses of the postal service for the next year. If gentlemen on the other side want political capital with which to go into the next presidential election, then pass this bill, but let them insert such a clause in it as that suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, which will enable the Postmaster-General to go on and spend the necessary money, and look to a future session of Congress for a deficiency appropriation bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. There are two minutes and a half left, and I propose to occupy that time.

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, the criticism made on the Postmaster-General by the gentleman from Indiana is entirely just. When that letter was written the Committee on Appropriations had reported to this House a bill in which it provided but $14,500,000 should be paid for the transportation of the mails. He had expended this year over $16,000,000. I think the gentleman's criticism was unjust, and that the Postmaster-General was simply exercising due caution when he saw this House intended to decrease his appropriation from $17,000,000, which was his estimate, down to $14,500,000, to look to the future and see how much he could reduce and retrench expenditures instead of increasing them. He had to give those gentlemen some answer, and he gave this one. It may not have been in the best taste, but I think the Postmaster-General knew what everybody else knows, that it is the disposition of the controlling power in this House to reduce expenses to a point which is so low that the service cannot properly be performed. We have a right to judge that by what they have already done. Take the legislative appropriation bill, and it is clear to every thinking man—indeed I do not believe there are twenty men in this House who do not know that several of the Departments under that bill will be seriously crippled if it should become a law as it has passed this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion now pending, but the gentleman can have the floor for five minutes to oppose it.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, having had no special responsibility in regard to this bill, I have watched it during the various stages of its progress with perhaps a somewhat critical eye, and yet with a sincere desire to discover every possible, practicable, and useful reform involved in the measure proposed by the committee. I do not propose even to occupy my five minutes in commenting upon its conclusion, but I wish to say here, and have it go into the RECORD, that, in my judgment, as a practical business proposition it is utterly and absolutely impracticable, and therefore in the last degree discreditable to the two hundred and ninety Representatives of the United States. I will make but one suggestion to establish my point, and that is founded upon what appears at or near the very conclusion of the bill. The fourteenth section provides that no post-office or service on any mail-route necessary for the public service and required for the proper and efficient distribution of the mails shall be discontinued; and then, turning over the leaf, the bill states that the appropriations are diminished below the estimates and also below the expenditures of last year by $5,750,000. If it be possible for any man to invent a more impossible proposition than is here presented to the country, then I am incapable of appreciating the force of language.

The Postmaster-General reports that during the last year he succeeded in reducing the expenses of the Post-Office Department for the first time in the history of the country, I believe, to the extent of $48,000, and yet here the Committee on Appropriations—I do not speak of them as opposed to me in politics; I do not speak from any partisan position—but I say the Committee on Appropriations come here and require him to perform the same service and all necessary increase of service with appropriations diminished by $5,750,000! I say, it seems to me discreditable to the ordinary intelligence of the House of Representatives that such a bill should go out of this committee. It never can become a law, and it never can be executed if it does become a law; and for one I wish to be recorded as speaking of this measure proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, as a whole, as utterly and absolutely impracticable.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew it. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he knows what the expenditure for the first three quarters of this year was, and, based on that, what would be the expenditure for this entire year? Is my friend able to state it?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not hear the gentleman's question exactly.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the current expenditure of the Department?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I stated at the outset that I had not studied the subject, but merely referred to the last page of the bill, and I am not prepared to answer him accurately.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not my friend answer me with some approach to accuracy?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman address himself to the point I made, that what is proposed in this bill is utterly impracticable?

Mr. HOLMAN. Those glittering generalities may do at Brooklyn, but they will hardly do here when applied to the discussion of practical questions.

Does not my friend know that the whole expenditures of this year, based on the expenditures of the first three months, will not exceed for transportation $16,100,000? And does he not know that this bill appropriates for that purpose very nearly that sum of money? Will my friend state now how much this bill appropriates less than the expenditures of this current year?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. This is the proposition I made: You require that the mail shall be carried, that there shall be no diminution in the public convenience, and that whatever is necessary shall be done according to the previous practice of the Government——

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. And then you require that it shall be done for $5,750,000 less money. What I say is that that is utterly impracticable.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, if the gentlemen is able to state how much it cost to carry on the Post-Office Department for this year, we shall have a tangible point to begin at; but if my friend is not able to state what it costs for the present fiscal year, he should inform himself of that by looking into the record.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I would ask the gentleman cannot a man say that it hurts him to cut six inches off his head, although he may not know how tall he is?

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be a very good anecdote, but I do not see the point of it.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Indiana says——

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will excuse me. I have only five minutes, and cannot yield to him further.

By examining the record the gentleman from New York would have been able to furnish us the first point of importance in this inquiry, what the cost is to the Department for the present fiscal year. Now there are items of expenditure absolutely increased by this bill over the expenditure of last year. Last year the star and steamboat routes cost us about $6,100,000, in round numbers, while we appropriate this year half a million dollars more.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The fast-mail line from New York to Chicago has been receiving $1,000 per mile, and by this bill you limit it to $600 a mile.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is hardly fair in the gentleman from Indiana to say that we are appropriating half a million dollars more for the star routes. We made no appropriations for the star routes at all; we appropriate in bulk.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman must excuse me, for that is a mere evasion, if I may be allowed to use the expression.

Mr. FOSTER. The evasion is on the other side.

Mr. HOLMAN. Last year it cost us $6,100,000; and do we not appropriate half a million dollars more for this purpose this year?

Mr. FOSTER. What did you appropriate last year for that service?

Mr. HOLMAN. We did not appropriate for it definitely, but in round numbers for that entire service. But I wish to say that, if my friend from New York will inquire a little more into the details of this service, the expenditure for the present and past years, if he will inform himself of these various details, and when he shall have devoted months to the investigation, then perhaps he may be justified in rising in his seat and denouncing the bill as impracticable and contrary to the common sense of this House, if such examination justified such sweeping remark.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not say that. I said the bill was impracticable. I was very polite, and if my words have been taken correctly I think it will appear from the RECORD that I did not say a discourteous word. I certainly had no discourteous feeling.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is always courteous, but he pronounced the whole measure an absurdity, without even examining the details of expenditure in this Department during the past years or what they are during the present year. I hope, Mr. Chairman, we will now have a vote on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the original proposition may be reported to the committee.

The Clerk again read section 14.

The question being taken on Mr. DIBRELL'S amendment, there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to add, after the fourteenth section, the following:

Provided, That no stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, or postal cards shall be sold by the Post-Office Department at less—in addition to the legal postage—than the cost, including all the salaries, clerk hire, and other expenses connected therewith, and cost of transportation per pound, including wrappers and cases, at not less than the lowest average cost per pound of the same as named in the letter of the Postmaster-General, in tabular form, under date of February 8, 1876, (Senate Miscellaneous Document 51, page 9,) and on all printed requests, stamped envelopes, fifty cents per thousand or half thousand envelopes.

I desire to have for a moment the attention of the committee to this very important proposition, and I hope I shall have the support of both sides of the House, as I know already I shall have the support of many members both of the Committee on Appropriations and of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

This amendment in substance prohibits the Postmaster-General from selling stamped envelopes and newspaper-wrappers at a price less than the actual cost to the Government. That is the whole of it in substance. The Post-Office Department contracts for envelopes and prints upon them the name of the sender with the direction to return if not called for within a certain time, procures newspaper-wrappers and transports them to different parts of the country and sells them at a loss, at an actual loss to the Government, as demonstrated by some tables which I have in my hand, amounting in all to upward of $2,000,000 a year.

In other words, while we are endeavoring to reduce the expenditures of the Post-Office Department to the lowest mark, while we are economizing in the matter of new post-offices in the sparsely-settled regions of the West and for the thickly-settled regions of the East, business men, wealthy, active business men, who use stamped envelopes, have their names stamped on them and tax the people to the amount of over $2,000,000 a year for the purpose of giving them that business facility. The effect of it is twofold: first, it increases by this large amount the deficit of the Post-Office Department; and, second, it enables the Post-Office Department to give a bounty to a few favored manufacturers of envelopes at the expense of all the other envelope-manufacturers of the country, giving to these favored few $2,000,000 for supplying the Government with this important branch of the service. I have a statement here which occupies eight or ten pages of this little pamphlet made up largely of figures, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed as a part of my remarks.

No objection was made, and the pamphlet is as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we appear before you representing the stationery, printing, and envelope interests, which are seriously affected by what we deem an unjust, unfair, and necessarily unequal competition. How large these interests are is best illustrated by saying they greatly exceed in number all the post-offices in this country, now numbering nearly thirty-six thousand.

Perhaps we cannot do better than lay our ground-work of complaint upon official data; and to begin with we beg to refer to the Postmaster-General's report, 1869, page 31, wherein he says:

"But the remaining cause of complaint has become intolerable, and must be removed, if the Department is to be saved from utter demoralization. The franking privilege has grown to be an abuse so monstrous that it now threatens the very life of the service."

Postmaster-General's report, 1869, page 32:

"It is clear, therefore, that all special privileges, to whomsoever granted, at the expense of the postal system, are hostile to the established theory upon which that system was founded, and has ever since been conducted, and that Government itself cannot justly claim such privileges, unless they can be shown to be essential."

Postmaster-General's report, 1869, page 34:

"If, therefore, the postage value of this free matter be computed at the minimum estimates of $1.25 per pound for letters and sixteen cents per pound for documents."

Postmaster-General's report, 1869, page 35:

"It will appear that the Government is bound in honor and justice to appropriate $5,000,000 instead of $700,000 for this service."

Postmaster-General's report, 1869, page 37:

"Should Congress conform to my recommendations in this respect, I confidently predict that millions will be saved annually to the Government, that the Department will be at once redeemed from its present condition of chronic bankruptcy, and that the postal service will speedily become the potent coadjutor of the people in developing and adorning our great country."

Franking privilege abolished July 1, 1873.

There seems, between the above and the clause following, from the same Postmaster-General, an inconsistency, which we cannot reconcile; if the abolishment of the franking privilege, in transportation of free matter will save $5,000,000 annually to the Department, how can 2,000,000 pounds of stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards be carried for nothing?

"Stamped envelopes are transported through the mails, it is true; but no mail contractor has ever asked or received any additional or extra compensation for that service; and were envelopes to be abolished entirely, it is very certain no abatement in the cost of transportation would be made. The envelopes are packed and delivered at the post-office in New York by the manufacturer, and at his expense; they are then handled, like other mail matter, by the Department's own officers and agents, until they reach their destination. No extra expense whatever is incurred; consequently the Department loses nothing."

Postmaster-General Jewell's report, 1874, page 28:

"For years the franking privilege was an incubus on the Department and an obstacle to efficient postal reform. Its abolition, for which we are largely indebted to the resolution and wisdom of my predecessor, opens the way for other measures which have yet to be inaugurated and pressed to a successful issue before the Department can become self-sustaining. While I do not flatter myself that I shall be able to accomplish this most desirable end during the short period of my service, I propose to keep it steadily in view, and to direct my best efforts toward its attainment. For the first time in the course of a life devoted actively to business, I find myself in charge of an establishment the expenditures of which largely exceed its receipts—a state of affairs which strikes with peculiar force a mind more or less disciplined by that close inspection of accounts enforced in mercantile pursuits. In ordinary business affairs there is but one end to this condition of things—bankruptcy."

Now, gentlemen, with all these official statements and data before you, how stands the yearly deficiency of the Post-Office Department? In 1869, $5,353,620.80; 1870, $3,969,383; 1871, $4,749,000; 1872, $6,310,602; 1873, $4,636,363; 1874, $7,815,878; 1875, $8,181,602.19; and for the centennial year it is estimated a general increase of 20 per cent., which would make the deficiency $9,817,922.63. This, since the abolishment of the franking privilege in July, 1873, which was to save $5,000,000 per annum.

If to this you add for the fiscal year 1876 the $5,000,000 (which was to have been saved, but was not, by the abolition of the franking privilege) you have a total prospective deficiency for the fiscal year 1876 of $14,817,922.63.

Having thus shown you the annual deficit for several years past and the prospective deficit for a year to come of nearly $10,000,000, it may be interesting at this point to make comparison of certain data. The Postmaster-General's report in 1869 estimated the cost of transportation of letters, &c., at $1.25 per pound and printed matter at sixteen cents per pound. In a letter to Postmaster-General Jewell, which we have before us, a most complete and exhaustive treatment of this subject-matter by George S. Bangs, esq., superintendent railway service Post-Office Department, we find the cost of carrying first-class matter, namely, letters, &c., $1.13-937 per pound, and the profit on this matter, 31.63 cents per pound; while on second class the cost is 14.28 cents, and on third class it is 20.07 cents per pound.

Therefore it will not be considered unfair to take this last and most elaborate and detailed statement, published within a few weeks, for our basis of comparison, namely: Total profit, first class, $4,212,390.70; loss, second class, $6,993,023.91; loss, third class, $4,113,915.53.

Profit, (as above,) $4,212,390.70. Loss, (as above,) $11,106,939.44.

We have a tariff to protect us from foreign competition; while we have a Department of the Government making war upon us, with a deficiency of $10,000,000 per annum, a large part of which deficiency supplies the sinews of war for that purpose.

We now propose to show you how a large part of such deficit affects the business interests we represent.

1. That the stamped envelopes now manufactured by the Post-Office Department are furnished exclusively for sale, and not for Government use.

2. That the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes, and the printing of address cards on the same by the Government, without any charge therefor, is an unjust and improper interference with your petitioners' business.

3. That the Government thereby becomes a powerful competitor against all envelope manufacturers, printers, lithographers, stationers, and over 50,000 dealers throughout the country, for business which should be conducted solely by private citizens and with private capital.

4. That the Government, by soliciting orders for envelopes through its 36,000 postmasters and carriers, comes upon the market as a retail dealer, offering to print address cards on them without charge, in direct competition with envelope manufacturers, printers, stationers, and other dealers, none of whom can afford to print envelopes for their customers gratuitously.

5. That the Government delivers envelopes through the mails to all of its 36,000 post-offices without charge to the consumer, overburdening the mails by adding many hundreds of tons annually, and increasing the rates charged by transportation companies for the mail service. While your petitioners are compelled to pay for such transportation they cannot compete with the Government, which has its printing and transportation done at the public expense.

6. That supplying stamped envelopes at less than cost benefits only large firms and corporations, who are abundantly able to pay a fair price for making and printing envelopes.

7. That by this interference of the Government their business is largely diminished, their machinery reduced in value, many hands thrown out of employment, and a great want of confidence felt in the trade, because the regulation of the prices of envelopes can be made arbitrarily by a single officer of the Government.

8. That this action of the Government operates as an invidious discrimination against your petitioners, and one not made against any other class of manufacturers or dealers, and constitutes a dangerous precedent, which, if followed in other Departments of the Government on all articles requiring a stamp, would powerfully tend to discourage private enterprise, and concentrate in a single Department of the Government unwarrantable powers.

The envelope manufacturers, printers, and stationers respectfully represent that the United States Government, through the Post-Office Department, has been for some years past manufacturing, selling, and printing envelopes, together with newspaper-wrappers and postal cards, at or below their cost to the Government, and delivering the same through the mails to all parts of the country free of charge, at a loss to the Post-Office Department of the cost of transportation, handling, &c.; printing address cards on the same gratuitously for merchants and others, requiring a large and expensive clerical force to receive copy and transmit orders for the same, at a total estimated loss to the Department for the fiscal year 1875 of $4,925,736.

In justice to the Post-Office Department we ought here to explain that all the foregoing is carried as registered matter, for the reason that it is the representative of money, or is, in fact, so much money; that is, one thousand envelopes with a three-cent stamp thereon represent a value of $30, while the envelopes themselves may only be worth $2 and $3.

Postmaster-General's report, 1875, pages 6 and 7:

"To this Department, in the transmission of packages of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other supplies for postmasters, the system is invaluable, as from a total number of 359,462 registered packages transmitted during the year, the postal value was $25,477,511.24."

Of these registered packages, 62,099 were plain stamped envelopes, 42,199 printed stamped envelopes, 32,931 postal cards. Total number of registered packages carried for the year 1875, 359,462. Of these 104,298 were stamped and printed envelopes, and 32,931 were postal cards, the last two combined making a total of 137,229 registered packages, or 17,409 packages more than one-third of the whole number carried, representing in weight 2,000,000 pounds, and in money value $5,200,636, or one-fifth of total revenue of the Post-Office Department.

We have been at some trouble to find out the checks the Post-Office Department put upon so much money value passing through the mails as "registered packages." These checks seem ample and justly so. This is the process to get five hundred request envelopes into the hands of a consumer at his own post-office:

Requiring ten record-books, eight blanks, and clerical labor, to do a business that pays the Post-Office Department nothing; in fact, creates a deficiency, an absolute loss.

We beg to call your attention to a few facts and figures on this subject.

Total receipts of the Post-Office Department from all sources for the fiscal year 1875, $25,500,000; $5,200,636 of which was collected by the use of—

72,285,000 stamped envelopes, plain	$2,046,111
54,631,000 printed envelopes, request	1,791,686
22,850,000 stamped newspaper-wrappers	286,679
107,500,000 postal cards	1,076,160
Total from the above four items	$5,200,636

The cost to transport this vast amount of merchandise and postal cards to post-offices was, on 156,000,000 of envelopes and newspaper-wrappers, averaging ten pounds to 1,000, packed in wooden boxes, estimating as per Superintendent Bangs's letter to Postmaster-General Jewell, December, 1875, on the business for the fiscal year, on 1,500,000 pounds first-class matter, at $1.14 per pound | $1,710,000
On 107,500,000 postal cards, averaging 7 pounds to 1,000, 752,500 pounds first-class matter, $1.14 per pound | 857,850
Cost of above 107,500,000 postal cards at $1.39½ per 1,000 | 150,500
Total cost | 2,718,350

Total receipts to Post-Office Department for above			5,200,636
Cost to send to post-offices in bulk as above	$2,718,350
Cost to distribute to the people, namely, 150,000,000 envelopes and wrappers, 8 pounds to 1,000, $1.14 per pound	1,368,000
107,500,000 postal cards, 6 pounds to 1,000, $1.14 per pound	735,300
		4,821,650
SPECIAL ITEMS.
Salaries, &c., stamp and postal agents of Post-Office Department	22,000
Extra compensation to New York and New Haven Railroad, for transportation	34,000
Cost blanks, envelopes, &c., to Department, estimated at	48,086
		104,086
			4,925,736
Net profit to the Post-Office Department			274,900

If only postage-stamps were used, and stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards abolished, the profit to the Post-Office Department would be as follows:

Total received		$5,200,636
Cost to distribute 257,500,000 envelopes, cards, and newspaper-wrappers, $1.14 per pound, to the people	$2,103,300
Cost of 257,500,000 postage-stamps, at 15 cents per thousand	38,625
		2,141,925
Profit to the Post-Office Department by abolishing the use of stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards		3,058,711
As against the profit by the use of stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and postal cards		274,900
Yearly increase of net revenue to the Post-Office Department by the sole use of stamps		2,783,811

Special estimate.

LOSS ON POSTAL CARDS.

107,500,000, at 7 pounds per thousand=752,500 pounds to post-offices, in wooden boxes, at $1.14 per pound	$857,850
The same, at 6 pounds, distributed to people at $1.14 per pound	735,300
Cost of 107,500,000 postal cards at $1.39½ cents (say $1.40) per thousand	150,500
Total cost to the Post-Office Department on the three items, above	1,743,650
Total income from above to Post-Office Department on 107,500,000 postal cards, at postage 1 cent each	1,075,000
Loss to the Post-Office Department on postal cards	668,650

In view of the above stated facts, your petitioners respectfully make the following suggestions:

SUGGESTIONS.

The manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes by the Post-Office Department, and the printing of address cards on the same, is not a necessity, and should be discontinued.

If this cannot be done, we would ask your honorable committee to add to the price of stamped envelopes, (and for printing thereon,) postal cards, and newspaper-wrappers enough to cover a part of the loss to the Post-Office Department by their use.

This loss, in excess of cost by the sole use of stamps, would be for the fiscal year, 1875 | $2,783,811

There should be added toward defraying cost of transportation *$1.60 per 1,000 on stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers; $1.40 per 1,000, cost of postal cards to the Post-Office Department; $1, per 1,000, as part cost of transportation, making a charge of $2.40 per 1,000 for postal cards. (Why should Post-Office Department give away postal cards when they sell envelopes?) Add 50 cents per 1,000, (or half thousand) to printed-request envelopes, to pay for extra expense to Post-Office Department to print, receive, record, and transmit orders therefor. If the suggestions above were made the law, the increase of revenue to Post-Office Department, based on the above estimates, would be for the fiscal year 1875, $525,315; namely, $1.60 per 1,000, on 150,000,000 envelopes and newspaper-wrappers would give $240,000; $2.40 per 1,000, on 107,500,000 postal cards, $258,000; 50 cents per 1,000 on 54,631,000 printed request envelopes, $27,315; total increase of revenue, $525,315.

If the post-office appropriation bill is amended in accordance with the above suggestions, for the fiscal year of 1876, it will amount to (on 20 per cent. increase of business, as per Postmaster-General's estimate) $630,378.

Respectfully submitted by,

CYRUS WHITE, Rockville, Conn.,

Committee appointed by convention held at Astor House, New York, January 13, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask a question. This is a subject which was not considered very much by the Committee on Appropriations, but it has been considered somewhat in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOAR. Is that a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. My question is this: The policy of the Government to encourage the use of stamped envelopes is against stamps. It is not a very important matter to the Government to introduce by every

*One dollar and sixty cents is the cost to transport third-class matter, as per Superintendent Bangs's estimate—say 8 pounds at 20 cents per pound for 1,000 envelopes.

method the use of envelopes instead of stamps? If I understand it, the Government is losing heavily every year by the washing out of stamps.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that this matter was brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and they were unable to give a thorough consideration to it, and when the post-office appropriation bill was introduced I inquired of the gentleman from Indiana whether the failure to put this clause in the bill indicated the opinion of the committee and itsho stility to it.

The gentleman answered in the negative, but that under the pressure of time they had failed to consider the subject in full; and that the subject was then before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I understand that a considerable number of that committee are in favor of the amendment. Whether the majority are or not, I cannot say. I do not doubt that gentlemen on the committee will say how far it was gone.

Now, in answer to the gentleman, it is true that it would be more agreeable to the Department to substitute the use of stamped envelopes for the use of stamps, but it certainly cannot be for the interest of the American people to pay $2,700,000 a year to accomplish that result. The gentleman has been cutting off many things in the Post-Office Department, and I say that although the Post-Office Department may find certain things convenient, yet that in the condition of the Department at the present time, while we are making these reductions, to permit them to pay out of the pockets of the people the sum of $2,700,000 a year to help to furnish these facilities to the business men of the country is not right, and especially it is not right to have their favorite manufacturers crushing out everybody else in the business.

Now the committee will notice that my amendment provides for a single thing, that these envelopes shall not be furnished to the people at less than their cost to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the whole amount of saving to the Government?

Mr. HOAR. It is estimated in this statement, which comes to me from a source which I highly respect, at $2,700,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the gentleman examined the subject enough to have a judgment of his own?

Mr. HOAR. I cannot say that I am authorized to state as of my own knowledge as an expert that this statement is true, but it seems to be irrefragable and impregnable. It is based on the reports of the Postmasters-General in the past. I have had a conversation in reference to the matter with the last Postmaster-General, and it is not denied that these envelopes were furnished to the people at great loss; and, in addition to that, two or three genglemen whose intelligence and business accuracy assure me that they are correct, although it is due in candor to the House to say that they are connected with this envelope business——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his amendment would be more proper as an additional section.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. I offer it as an additional section, but as the fifteenth section of the bill repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this, it should come in as an additional section at this point.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Government loses over $2,000,000 by furnishing these envelopes?

Mr. HOAR. I so understand it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to say, as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that this matter was brought to their attention two weeks ago, as I now recollect, and was referred to a subcommittee which has not yet reported. From an investigation that I made in a former Congress I may say that I have a very decided opinion about the proposed amendment. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the whole envelope business was built up by the Post-Office Department. Formerly there was a full rate of postage charged upon letters and also a full rate upon every envelope and inclosure; but a good many years ago, I think in 1850 or about that time, the law was amended so as to carry a letter for one rate of postage weighing one-half ounce, without reference to the envelope or the number of inclosures it contained, and then for the first time the envelope was introduced and the business of envelope manufacturing grew up.

Now, I do not think this legislation is wise, for several reasons, and principally as to the postal revenues.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Does not the furnishing of these envelopes cost the Government $2,700,000 or thereabouts?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, before I get through I will answer him. Take the postal cards alone. The pamphlet to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred is directed, not only against the stamped envelopes but against postal cards. A thousand of those cards cost the Government manufactured $1.40, and yet there is great profit in selling them at $10, notwithstanding that the Government pays for making them.

If you could have twenty times more postal cards than you have, you would not have any deficiency at all of the revenues of the Department. The gentleman from Indiana made an argument which alone would be conclusive against this amendment. He stated that the washed stamps, with all the appliances and safeguards that can be devised against such frauds, amount to between one and two million dollars annually. Sir, that is the estimate as to the loss of the Department in this particular. Now, you cannot wash the stamp on a stamped envelope. When the envelope is used, that is the end of it.

Again, under the postal code you cannot mail a letter with a stamp on it on any train except a railway post-office train, because only such trains are provided with the appliances for canceling the stamps as required by law; but the moment you put a letter in a stamped envelope you can mail it anywhere upon a post-route or a railroad.

Besides, the Government gets the net cost for these envelopes. True, it loses the transportation from the manufactory to the post-offices throughout the country; but that is all it loses. It gets the net cost for the envelopes; and where envelopes are sold by the single package or retailed, it gets a little more than net cost.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the Government lose the cost of transportation? Is there really any additional cost by reason of the fact that these envelopes are carried in the mails?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. O, no; this cost of $2,500,000 for transportation is figured up at fancy rates—at $1.14 a pound, I believe. The Government really does not lose anything upon the stamp envelopes unless it loses in their transportation from the manufactory to the different offices; and this is more than made up by the encouragement of this first-class matter which pays a profit and should be encouraged. Again, the printed return request on stamped envelopes is not only a matter of great convenience to the people, but I am told at the Department if it was not used upon those envelopes you would have to employ at least one hundred more clerks in the dead-letter office to dispose of the matter that would then accumulate.

I might talk longer about this; but I am satisfied, from a careful investigation, that the legislation here proposed is not wise. It is nothing more nor less than the protection of a special interest, namely, the manufacture of envelopes; and I do not think that we want to protect any special interest at the expense of the people and at the expense of the Post-Office Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend by striking out the last word. It seems to me that the reply to the whole argument of the gentleman from Illinois is this: These figures are taken from the estimates in the Postmaster-General's reports; they are official. This amount of loss to the Department—I say this in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE]—is an inference from the estimate of the Postmaster-General.

Now, the amendment which I offer avoids carefully the objection which has been made. It simply provides that the Postmaster-General shall not sell these articles at a loss. If, therefore, it is true that they are not sold at a loss, the Postmaster-General is not in the least hampered by the amendment. It simply says: "As the Postmaster-General's reports show that $2,700,000 is lost to the Government by furnishing this particular facility to business men, you shall hereafter afford it at what it costs, taking your own estimate of the cost."

It is said that this amendment is in the interest of a monopoly. How absurd to say that an amendment which provides that the Government shall not go to a particular manufacturer of envelopes and pay him out of the Treasury $2,700,000 more than you can sell the articles for is encouraging a monopoly! On the contrary, this strikes at a monopoly. The complaint which men engaged in the general envelope business make is that, under the existing practice, the Government is giving to one of their rivals the power to crush them all out by paying him for these articles $2,700,000 more than the Government realizes from them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is it not true that the contract for making the envelopes and postal-cards is open to competition by everybody? Cannot all these gentlemen engaged in the manufacture put in bids?

Mr. HOAR. I say very frankly that I am not able to answer that question. This is a question I have heard put a great many times about Government contracts; and the answer is always in the affirmative; yet, somehow or other, Government contracts ever since the days of George Washington have gone in certain directions; and all the legislation we can devise does not prevent it.

But let me repeat—and I call the attention of the committee to the statement—we do not propose to prohibit the Postmaster-General from doing what he does now in regard to contracting with the lowest bidder. We merely propose to say to him, "You shall not sell these things to business men for less than they cost the Treasury." We do not go into any detail. We do not give any man any improper advantage in the contract, or prohibit any man from having any proper advantage. We simply say by law that the Post-Office Department shall sell these things for what it has to pay for them.

The amendment of Mr. HOAR was again read.

Mr. HOAR. I will modify my amendment by striking out "postal cards."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his formal amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps that will answer the purpose I have in view. I wish to say this: The theory of the postal-card service is that the citizen should be afforded a card upon which limited correspondence may be carried on at one cent. If the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts goes to the extent of saying these postal cards shall not be sold for less than one cost with the charge of postage, then it will follow that we will raise the postage on postal cards from one cent to one cent and the fraction of a cent to the extent of the cost of the card itself. I take it my friend does not mean to say what he does say if his amendment stands as at first written, for it raises the postage, as I have stated, on the postal card from one cent to one cent and, say, one-fifth of a cent. It would be difficult to manage postage of that kind. We could not make change. We must have it fixed at one cent or two cents; we cannot have the fraction of a cent in our postage.

Again I wish to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if his amendment applies to stamped envelopes there I think he is only right. If we are paying a sum for the manufacture of stamped envelopes greater by any amount whatever than we get for them when we sell them as envelopes that ought to be corrected. If he alleges, with ground for believing it is so—I know, of course, he believes what he says—but if he has any facts which justify our action in that regard I am with him heartily and wholly that we ought not to go into the market as a manufacturing corporation as it were, "cutting under" private individuals engaged in the same manufacture. I wish to say if the statistics he has given, which were startling to me, are found to be true, leaving out "postal cards," if they are true as to stamped envelopes or in reference to anything furnished by the Post-Office Department, then I am with him.

Mr. HOAR. I was led to strike out "postal cards" because I saw myself the difficulty of having for postal cards the price of a cent and the fraction of a cent. It did not occur to me when I offered my amendment. As it now stands I think it is a good one.

Mr. HARRISON. Allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from Ohio. In regard to the other proposition it makes no difference. The amendment is they shall not sell for less than cost.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts if he proposes to add to the cost of the envelopes their transportation, then envelopes printed in Washington will cost persons a certain amount, while to persons far off in the country to whom they will have to be carried, they will cost a different price, as the cost of the carriage will have to be added.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not that necessarily follow?

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Post-Office Department will take the aggregate or average cost.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it proposed to have it at the average cost?

Mr. GARFIELD. By leaving out postal-cards we get at what is proposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Read the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the cost of transportation, because it does strike me that will make it exceedingly difficult to get at the average cost; besides, it is not fair.

Mr. HOAR. I am authorized to state that the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, if he had been present in the House, would have moved the amendment himself.

Mr. WADDELL. I would have offered this amendment myself if I had been here. I am chairman of the subcommittee on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads which had this subject under consideration. We considered it quite fully. I have a communication from the Postmaster-General on the subject, which we also considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as we have no statement from the Post-Office Department on the subject, I trust the gentleman from North Carolina will leave that out. While he is getting the letter, I suggest "transportation" should be stricken out. This is a question which concerns the Government. It is true the Government should not be allowed to enter into private enterprise, thus coming into conflict with the enterprise of private individuals of whatever pertains to the Post-Office Department, and its various economies must be considered to concern the Government, no matter what other interests are affected thereby.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman does not take the ground this House is not to be the judge after we get to the end of the bill. I do not wish to misunderstand his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Congress is the only judge of what is proper, but of course it must listen attentively to the views of the Postmaster-General on such a subject. It seems to me whatever does not enter into the cost of these envelopes ought not to be included; and transportation does not.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Transportation does.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under our postal system, the cost to the Government is almost unappreciable, and there is no reason for taking it into the account. I ask that portion of the gentleman's amendment be omitted. I make the motion to strike it out.

Mr. WADDELL. I now ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, inclosing bill (H. R. No. 2945) requiring the Postmaster-General "to procure for the use of every post-office in the United States a post-mark and canceling stamp and a uniform canceling ink of an inerasible character," and requesting my opinion of the same.

Section 175 of the postal code of 1873 enacts "that postage-stamps affixed to all mail matter, or the stamped envelopes in which the same is inclosed when deposited for mailing or delivery, shall be defaced by the postmaster at the mailing office in such manner as the Postmaster-General may direct;" * * * and the post-office appropriation bills contain an item for the purchase of "post-marking and canceling stamps." It would therefore appear that the Postmaster-General has all the authority sought to be conferred by this bill.

With reference to the manner in which the Department exercises its discretion in the matter, all post-offices yielding a revenue of $50 and upward are supplied with post-marking and canceling instruments; and section 404 of the postal regulations requires that at such offices the cancellation shall be effected with black printing-ink, and at other offices with a pen dipped in good black writing-fluid.

For more than a year past the Department has devoted a large share of attention to the examination of mechanical devices and so-called indelible inks intended for the better cancellation of stamps; but the results have not been sufficiently satisfactory to induce me at this time to ask any legislation upon the subject. I must therefore respectfully decline to recommend the passage of the bill in question. It might be urged, also, as a serious objection to the bill, that it appropriates an indefinite amount of money to enable the Postmaster-General to carry out its provisions.

In answer to the inquiry in the last paragraph of your letter, I am most emphatically in favor of continuing the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes. These envelopes, by their convenience and utility, have so commended themselves to the public and the Department that their discontinuance would justly be regarded as a long stride backward in the march of postal progress. In my judgment the effort of legislation should be rather to encourage than to prevent the use of stamped envelopes, so indispensable have they come to be regarded by the public and so great are their advantages in every point of view over adhesive postage-stamps. One advantage is suggested by the bill referred to above, which aims to correct an abuse in the re-use of postage-stamps, an abuse which manifestly cannot exist in the case of stamped envelopes.

Herewith bill H. R. No. 2945 is returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MARSHALL JEWELL,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. A. M. WADDELL,
Chairman Subcommittee Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that debate shall now close on this paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana that debate shall close on the pending section?

Objection was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will agree that five minutes shall be allowed, if that would satisfy the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] otherwise I must move that the committee rise that I may ask the House to close debate on the pending section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition that debate shall close in five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in this very large saving proposed here the rate of transportation on this mail matter is $1.14 per pound. I think my friend from Massachusetts has put the cost of transportation pretty high. I think in freight-cars this matter might be transported for a half cent per pound, and it would amount to a small item. But it is put in here at $1.14 per pound. There might be a large saving to the Government on this item.

Mr. HOAR. My answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is that this amendment only directs the Postmaster-General to sell these things at the actual cost, and no less. Now, if the actual cost is $1.14 a pound, then that is put in to make up the average. If it is a tenth of that, he adds only a tenth. He being in favor of the system will make the cost as low as he possibly can cipher it down to. All this we leave to him. We only say he shall charge the actual cost.

Now as to the desirability of using stamped envelopes, I agree to that. But stamped envelopes are for the convenience of a class of persons who will buy and pay for them whether you add a mill or five mills to the cost of the envelopes. That is, the addition to the price of these things of the actual cost will not very largely diminish their sale, because they are purchased by a class of persons to whom a slight change of price is a matter of indifference. But the burden now existing comes upon the whole body of the people, and to maintain this convenience to the merchants and business men of this country, there must be hundreds of post-offices refused in the West, in Texas, in the South, and all over the country. When you apply, as the gentleman from Kentucky did, to the Postmaster-General to extend postal facilities to your people, or revive those discontinued during or since the war, the Postmaster-General will reply, "I am using up $2,000,000 of the revenue of the Department in furnishing these things at less than cost to these wealthy business men; therefore you cannot have your postal facilities."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words:

And cost of transportation per pound, including wrappers and cases, at not less than the lowest average cost per pound of the same as named in the letter of the Postmaster-General in a tabulated form under date of February 8, 1876. (Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 51, page 9.)

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to suggest an additional amendment to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been closed on the pending section, and that is in the nature of discussion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I merely wish to ask a question. The gentleman from Indiana proposes in that amendment to allow the charge of fifty cents per thousand or half thousand printed request-stamped envelopes to remain.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not propose to strike that out.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to this fact——

Mr. HOAR. I object to debate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will make my statement in this way. If you quit selling those printed-request stamped envelopes——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now move to amend the amendment by striking out these words:

On all printed-request stamped envelopes, fifty cents per thousand or half-thousand envelopes.

If this be adopted, the Postmaster-General will have to employ fifty additional clerks in the Dead-Letter Office.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, there were—ayes 57, noes 40.

So (further count not being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR'S amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I offer the following as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all mailable matter of the third class, referred to in sections 3878 and 3911 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof; and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed; but nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 3879 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. STOWELL. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The House suspended the rules, and made the amendment in order.

This subject has been debated frequently in the House in an exhaustive and elaborate manner; and I only deem it necessary to state that this amendment fixes the rate of postage on third-class matter as described in section 3878 of the Revised Statutes at one cent for two ounces, and that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are unanimous in their recommendation that this amendment be adopted. I will also state further that this is a precise copy of a bill that passed this House some three months ago in relation to this subject. I suppose that it is not necessary to discuss the subject at all.

Mr. STOWELL. I desire to raise a question of order on this amendment, and it is that it is not germane to the subject-matter and that it changes existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. The rules were suspended to allow it to be offered.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I moved on a Monday to suspend the rules to make this amendment in order, and the rules were suspended. I suppose therefore that the point of order does not apply to this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that on a Monday the rules were suspended to enable the gentleman from Missouri to offer this amendment in the Committee of the Whole. A suspension of the rules is a suspension of all rules that are in the way of the committee doing what they desire to do.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The subject has been so fully discussed that it is unnecessary to further debate it now.

I desire to put in the RECORD an extract from a petition of New York book-publishers which refers to the Senate postal bill under consideration in that body in April last. The extract is pertinent to the amendment now submitted and shows the propriety of it. It is as follows:

Our objection to the bill is the excessive rate to which it subjects the transportation of books and other printed matter not issued at stated intervals; and our prayer is for restoration of the old rate, namely, one cent per two ounces or fraction thereof. In support of this petition, we would offer briefly the following considerations:

First. The assumption by the Government of the business of carrying letters and printed matter is founded upon the theory that it is to the interest of the Government to facilitate communication among the people, and thereby the spread of intelligence. This point is strongly urged, and has, we believe, been considered convincing in determining the question of postage on newspapers. If it is convincing in that class of printed matter, how much stronger is it with respect to books, the most potent and permanent of all intellectual agencies? And this argument acquires additional force from the fact that of all the books published in the United States three-fourths are of an educational character. If the dissemination of knowledge is any part of the duty of the Government, surely this class of matter deserves its first consideration. Thousands of educational works are sent out annually without charge, to teachers, school boards, and others, for examination. This is a necessary step in the introduction of educational works, and has led to that active competition among authors and publishers which has produced the superior school literature of to-day, as compared with that of former times. We urge, then, that the same enlightened motive which induces both the national and the State governments to favor universal education may with conspicuous consistency extend to such legislation as shall facilitate rather than obstruct the distribution of text-books, which are the necessary apparatus of popular instruction. In this connection we would state, also, that all books cannot be purchased at every cross-roads store, as can articles of merchandise, and the residents of those isolated localities are justified in expecting the Government to carry to them articles essential to their education and which they cannot in any other way readily obtain.

Secondly. As regards other printed matter not issued at stated intervals, as circulars, catalogues, &c., it is susceptible of abundant proof that the distribution of this class of matter not only improves the trade of the country, but likewise materially increases written correspondence, the carrying of which is admittedly profitable to the Government. There is, therefore, every reason derived from considerations of the public good why the carriage of such matter should be placed at a minimum rate, and that the present onerous and prohibitory charges, which have proved a serious drawback to the business of the country, shall be removed.

Thirdly. We hold that if your honorable body will obtain all the facts relating to the weight and cost of transportation of each class of mail matter it will be manifest that no part of the deficit of the postal service was caused by the transportation of printed matter of the third class at 1 cent per 2 ounces, when that rate obtained. A tabular statement submitted by the Postmaster-General to the Committee of your honorable body on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, under date of February 8, 1876, shows the average distance to which all matter of the third class was conveyed was 813⅓ miles, and the average weight of each piece was only 3 ounces. We have no reason to doubt the accuracy of this part of the statement, but we know that the average distance which books, especially those of an educational character, are conveyed is less than half the distance. Indeed, the average, according to the best of our judgment, will not exceed 400 miles, and the parcels, as a rule, contain only a single copy, and therefore are in no way burdensome to the Department. Add to this the significant fact that express charges for the average distance to which educational works are sent would not exceed 3 cents per pound, and we are brought to the conclusion that the price proposed in the bill is far in excess of cost of service.

Fourthly. We urge that so far as regards the revenue to the Government a recurrence to the old rate of postage on the class of matter now under consideration would be more productive than under the present rate; and this for a twofold reason: First, the large positive diminution of mailage in this class of matter, caused by the existing onerous charge and, secondly, the diversion into other channels of transportation of a large volume of printed matter, the carrying of all of which would be profitable to the Postal Department.

Fifthly. We respectfully call your attention to the following strange anomaly resulting from the action of the proposed law in connection with the existing postal treaty with foreign countries. Under our postal arrangement with Canada, the Canadian citizen can have his circulars and catalogues carried to any part of the United States at the rate of 1 cent per 4 ounces, or 4 cents per pound, while his American competitor, under your proposed bill, has to pay 1 cent per ounce, or 16 cents per pound. If this bill becomes a law, then the Canadian publisher may issue a non-copyright book in competition with the American publisher, and the American Government not only allows this foreign competitor to reach the American market with his advertisements at a less rate, but even permits these books of this foreign competitor to reach the consumer in the United States at one-fourth the charge that it makes to its own citizens. The only way for the American citizen to compete with this rival across the border is by sending his catalogues and other mailable packages to the nearest Canadian post and custom office, and mailing them from there. It is not to be doubted, however, that by the restoration of the old rate, though there would still be inducement to take this course, the temptation to do so would be substantially removed.

In conclusion, we beg leave to state that in making our petition to your honorable body, we do not ask any legislation specially favorable to our calling; but we do urge that the proposed rates are exorbitant for transportation of printed matter of the third class; that they will prove injurious to the business interests of the country; that they will oppose what they should aid, to wit, the better education of the people, and, finally, that they will not give you the increase in the revenue which you desire. For these reasons we pray for a return to the former rate of postage, to wit: 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

Mr. STOWELL. I trust this amendment will not be adopted. This subject has been considered by the House and the House has passed a bill in reference to it and sent it to the Senate. The Senate have also considered the subject and made an amendment to the bill, and I understand that the bill is now in a committee of conference, or if not, it is upon the Speaker's table. That bill regulated this whole question of postage on third-class matter. The subject having received the consideration of both Houses of Congress, and a bill having been passed, it ought not to be tacked to an appropriation bill. So far as the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is concerned, I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is mistaken in saying that they were unanimous.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I beg to correct that statement. The gentleman from Virginia has been absent so often of late that I had forgotten that he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. STOWELL. This subject has been considered in the first place by the House. The House, as I have said, passed the bill and sent it to the Senate. The Senate have made an amendment in one particular only, and the bill is now either on the Speaker's table or in a conference committee, one or the other. I think we should not endeavor to force legislation in this way through the means of an appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL, I should not have said a word upon this question if the gentleman from Virginia had not said that it was improper to connect this provision with an appropriation bill. Now, he must remember that the two sections which we proposed to restore were abrogated on an appropriation bill and it was done without the consideration or approval of the House, without any discussion or without the knowledge of one in twenty of the members of the House.

Mr. STOWELL. The very fact that these sections were originally passed on an appropriation bill without the opportunity of a consideration or discussion is the very reason why we should not agree to this proposition now.

Mr. RANDALL. We are remedying a great wrong, not in the manner suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, but after full discussion and after the deliberate judgment of the House, which has been clearly reached. And I say to the gentleman here that unless we put this provision in an appropriation bill the infamy perpetrated by the last Congress in an appropriation bill cannot be made null and void. The interests at stake are enormous. There are gentlemen in this city representing the envelope interest, some of whom have spoken to me and appealed to me in reference to this matter. They are here, and unless we take this proposition right by the throat and force it into the bill, the result will be that the express companies will again force through Congress provisions in their interest.

Mr. EAMES. I offer the following amendment, to be added to that of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK:]

And on and after the 1st day of July, 1876, the postage on letters to and from any place in the United States, excepting local and drop letters, shall be charged at the uniform rate of two cents for each half an ounce or fraction thereof.

Mr. Chairman, since the adoption of the postal service great changes have been made in the postage on letters. The first law fixed that postage at from six to twenty-five cents, and was based upon distance. In 1845 a change was made to five cents under and ten cents over three hundred miles, and from time to time since the rate has been reduced on letter postage, and in the year 1863 the rate was fixed at three cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof without regard to distance.

It is thirteen years since any change has been made, and my proposition now is to reduce the postage on letters to the point where it has been in England since 1840; that is, to the uniform rate of two cents. Under the law of March 3, 1845, the postage was fixed at five cents under and at ten cents over three hundred miles. The receipts in 1844 were $4,237,287.88 and the expenditures were during the same year $4,296,512.70. In 1845, after the passage of the act to which I have referred, the receipts were $4,289,841.80 and the expenditures $4,320,731.99. On the 3d of March, 1851, the postage on letters was fixed at three cents, prepaid, and five cents, unpaid. The receipts in the year 1850 were $5,499,984.86 and the expenditures $5,212,953.43.

In 1851 the receipts were $6,410,604.33 and the expenditures were $6,278,401.68. This shows that the deficiency in the postal service was less than it had been before this reduction was made. In 1855 the rate established was three cents under and ten cents over three thousand miles prepaid; and in 1854 the receipts were $6,255,586.22 and the expenditures were $8,577,424.12. In 1855 the receipts were $6,642,136.13 and the expenditures $9,968,342.29, showing an increased deficiency under the act of March 3, 1855.

The act of March 3, 1863, fixed the rate of letter postage prepaid at three cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof, without regard to distance, and this rate has continued to the present time. The receipts in 1862 were $8,299,820.90 and the expenditures $11,125,364.13. In 1863 the receipts were $11,163,789.59 and the expenditures $11,314,-296.84. In 1864 the receipts were $12,438,253.78 and the expenditures $12,644,786.20—showing in these years, as also in 1865, that the receipts were nearly equal to the expenses of the service. Since 1865 under this law the receipts have increased from about $14,000,000 to $27,000,000 and the deficiency has been from about $4,000,000 to $6,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these figures, I think, indicate that the reduction of postage has been attended by a large increase of the revenue, and, although the expenses have also increased by extending the postal service, the deficiency has been but slightly increased.

In 1837, from a statement which I think is reliable, the number of letters carried through the mails in England was 82,000,000. The penny postage in that country went into operation in 1840, and in 1859 the number of letters increased to 545,000,000.

The postal revenue in England in 1835 was about $8,000,000, and in 1859 was $15,000,000, an amount in excess of the postal expenses.

In this country the result of reducing postage has been followed with a like result in increasing the postal revenues, and the deficiency between receipts and expenses has not been much increased.

Even if the deficiency has increased, it is no reason why the reduction should not be made. The rates of postage on letters, as now established, operate unequally and unjustly.

A letter that is carried a distance of a mile pays three cents, and a letter that is transported across the continued pays only three cents. In only seven of the States are the postal receipts in excess of the expenses incurred. In all of the other States the expenses exceed the postal receipts.

The deficiency in the postal service if paid from the Treasury will be a more just and equitable distribution of the expenses of the postal service than the rates of postage now required under existing laws.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the debate close.

Objection was made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the post-office appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the paragraph now before the committee close in one minute.

Mr. EAMES. I hope the gentleman will amend that motion so as to make the time five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will modify my motion in that way.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. EAMES. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee any length of time, but I have one or two remarks that I desire to make. This deficiency which has existed in the Postal Department for ten years or more has originated entirely from the second and third class mail matter. The deficiency in the second class has been something like $4,000,000 a year, and the deficiency in the third class about $6,000,000 a year, while the excess upon letter postage has been something like $4,000,000 for years past.

The reduction of letter postage proposed by this amendment has been already commenced by the introduction of the postal card. In the last year postal cards to the number of 107,000,000 have been disposed of at one cent each, and I can see no good or substantial reason why a postal card should be passed through the mails for a cent and the postage on a letter of a half ounce or less should be three cents. It costs no more to carry the one than the other.

The effect of this amendment, I think, will be to reduce the number of postal cards and increase the number of letters at double the postage of the postal card, and thus rather reduce than increase the present deficiency in the postal service.

I want to say further to the committee that this is no party measure. It has been proposed in the conventions of both political parties in years past, and bills of the same tenor, some of them proposing the reduction to one cent and some to two cents, have been introduced here by members on both sides of the House. It is a measure in the interests of the people. It is one of the measures that the people will approve, and its benefits will reach every hearth and home throughout the broad expanse of the Republic.

Mr. STOWELL. I want to say that, as the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] has just said, there is a revenue from first-class mail matter of $9,000,000, while there is a deficit in the second-class mail matter of $4,000,000, and a deficit in the third-class mail matter of $6,000,000. This amendment proposes to reduce the postage on third-class mail matter from one cent an ounce to half a cent. A bill has already passed the House having the same object in view as this amendment, to reduce the postage on third-class mail matter from one cent to a half cent an ounce; but that class of matter which comes under the head of merchandise, and which does not properly apply to the mails, is left at one cent. That bill is now upon the Speaker's table ready to be acted on at any time, and it seems to me that it would be better for the House to act on that bill instead of forcing legislation through an appropriation bill.

The question was taken on Mr. EAMES's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK,] to be inserted in the proper place:

And that all annual reports of universities, colleges, and other institutions, and annual catalogues, shall be deemed third-class matter.

That class of matter has been considered first-class matter heretofore and charged at a higher rate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That amendment is right, and I think there can be no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being on a division ayes 99, noes not counted.

The amendment of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, as amended, was then agreed to.

The Clerk read the last section of the bill, as follows:

That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the committee to go back to page 2, line 36, of this bill, for the purpose of moving an increased appropriation for letter-carriers.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move in lines 36 and 37 to strike out "$1,650,000" and to insert "$1,800,000;" so that it will read:

For payments to letter-carriers, $1,800,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says that is right, we will all agree to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that it cost this year $2,000,000 to perform this service, and the service is not lessened in any way by this bill. Those who perform this service now get very small pay, and I do not think the gentleman can afford to propose any reduction of that compensation. I want to know how the gentleman proposes to run this service for $250,000 less next year than this year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have an amendment, which I will offer after the pending amendment is adopted, which I think will meet the point.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to further amend the paragraph by adding the following:

It shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to carefully inquire into the number of carriers employed in the several cities where the free delivery of mail-matter is established, and to reduce the number of carriers and the number of deliveries of the mail by such carriers, for each day, to the reasonable requirements of the service.

It will be seen on examining the report of the Postmaster-General, on pages 205-9, that there should be a very careful revision of this branch of the service. It is believed that if that revision is made the estimate of the Committee on Appropriations, $1,800,000, will be found to be sufficient.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 70, noes 28.

No further count being demanded, the amendment was declared to be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask unanimous consent to go back to section 2 of this bill, the section appropriating for deficiencies in the Post-Office Department.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The deficiency originally reported in this bill was $2,680,906. The Committee of the Whole have added $1,100,000 for transportation, $300,000 for postmasters and $150,000 for carriers, making the whole amount of deficiences $4,230,906. I move to amend section 2 by striking out "$2,680,906" and inserting "$4,230,906."

I desire to state that the total appropriations by this bill, as amended, are not materially less than the appropriations made by the last Congress for the Post-Office Department for the present fiscal year. The deficiency for the present fiscal year was estimated at $6,852,705, and for the next fiscal year the appropriation for deficiency will be $4,230,906. The reduction by this bill from the appropriations for the present fiscal year is only about $2,520,000. Therefore the apprehension of gentlemen that there was to be a greater reduction by this bill than the public service justifies, is of course without foundation. If the Post-Office Department is correct as to the reform proposed in the manner of paying railroads for transporting the mails, the saving to the Government on that item alone will more than justify the reduction made by this bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Where are the principal reductions made by this bill from the appropriations made last year?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is but one item of reduction that is material, that amounts to any considerable sum, that is in the matter of transportation of mails by the railroads. The estimate for the present fiscal year was $10,500,000; the expenditure for the last fiscal year was about $9,100,000. If the Committee on Appropriations is correct in its assumption of what will be the reduction of the cost of transporting the mails by railroads under the new system of payment proposed by this bill, then this appropriation will be ample for every branch of the Post-Office Department. With the affairs of the Department administered honestly, as we have reason to believe they will be, as we trust they will be, the appropriations made by this bill will be ample.

The amendment moved by Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee now rise and report this bill with the pending amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House, with sundry amendments, and recommend that the amendments be concurred in, and the bill as amended passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before calling the previous question on the bill and pending amendments, I will yield, according to my promise, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to move the amendment which he indicated while the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, in regard to the limitation upon the salaries of postmasters.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move to amend section 5 of the bill by striking out the last proviso.

The proviso proposed to be stricken out was as follows:

And provided further, That the maximum salary and compensation of any postmaster under the provisions of this act shall not exceed the sum of $4,000, except in the city of New York, where the salary and compensation shall be the sum of $6,000, and no more.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole be considered as concurred in by the House, except where a separate vote may be asked on any of them.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following amendment (on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. HARRISON) was read:

Add to the seventh section the following: "But the sum paid to any railroad company for such transportation shall not exceed $500 a mile for such service for any one year."

The amendment was agreed to, there being ayes 144, noes not counted.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, to strike out the proviso at the end of section 5.

The amendment was not agreed to, there being ayes 46, noes not counted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3136) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made be taken from the Speaker's table in order that a verbal amendment of the Senate may be concurred in.

There being no objection, the amendment of the Senate to strike out "section 101" and insert "section 1" was read and concurred in.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3430) to repair and rebuild the levees of the Mississippi River, to reclaim the alluvial lands thereof, to improve its navigation, and promote and protect its commerce, which was made a special order for to-day, be made a special order for Wednesday next, the 24th instant, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Subject to the priority of general appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I still reserve the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Subject to those reservations the order will be made, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged question—to report back with certain amendments the resolution referred yesterday to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that the Committee on Printing have the privilege of reporting at any time for the purpose of reference to the Committee of the Whole; but——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa made no objection. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] representing the Committee on Printing, is on the floor upon a privileged question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is always in order to make a point of order, even after a proposition has been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair rules that the matter of printing is a highly privileged question. The Committee on Printing have the right to report at any time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Relative to matters referred to them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The language of the rule is "about printing." This is about "matters of printing."

The Clerk read as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred back one of the resolutions reported by said committee, containing an instruction to the Committee on Appropriations to insert certain sections in the sundry civil bill to be by them hereafter reported to this House, having had the same under consideration, have instructed me to report back the said resolution and a bill accompanying it, with the following amendment:

In the second line of said resolution, to strike out the words "instructed to embody," and insert in lieu thereof the words "requested to inquire into the expediency of embodying."

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the question of order which I now propose to raise was up in the last Congress, or last but one, upon this very matter. At that time General Beatty, of Ohio, then chairman of the Committee on Printing, claimed the right to report at any time a general bill concerning printing; and the Speaker made a very careful statement to the House on the proposition that the privilege of the Committee on Printing related only to the current printing of the House, and did not include a matter of general law in regard to printing. He illustrated that position by a like ruling which had prevailed in regard to other committees authorized to report at any time—the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations. That decision was submitted to the House on an appeal, and, with but three or four dissenting voices, the opinion of the Speaker was sustained.

I therefore make the point that this report is not in order. I do not specially desire to oppose this proposition, but merely to preserve the privileges of the House. The ruling referred to was one of the most carefully considered that has been made since I have been a member here.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. And it was sustained by the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Having originally raised this point of order, I desire to add further that there must be a distinction between the printing of current documents for the use of the House and a proposition for a change in the general law. Upon the call of committees, this committee has the right to report changes in the general law; and in that way such a proposition as this might come in.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will allow me one word, I wish to say that Mr. Speaker BLAINE at the time referred to traced the history of this very point through a series of rulings going back to the original adoption of the rule, and embracing decisions by Speaker Winthrop and some of the old democratic Speakers. He fortified himself by several very important precedents adopted on careful consideration, and also by reference to the debates in which, with others, Mr. Andrew Stevenson had taken part.

I have no particular interest in opposing this proposition; I merely desire that the ruling shall be correct. Rather than have a wrong decision, I would prefer that the matter should come in by unanimous consent. In the decision of Mr. Speaker BLAINE, when General Beatty raised this question, the Chair will find a very full and interesting discussion of this whole subject.

Mr. SINGLETON. It seems to me the objection comes too late. If it had been made yesterday, when the report from the Committee on Printing was first brought up for consideration, perhaps it would have been well taken. We propose now to report back a resolution which was recommitted to the Committee on Printing in accordance with the instructions of the House, and that certainly is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he can escape all difficulty in this connection by now moving to reconsider the vote by which this subject was recommitted.

Mr. HOAR. That will cover it.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the subject was recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion, I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would gladly postpone any ruling in reference to these "matters of printing" and their privileges. The case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, brought in by Mr. Beatty, of Ohio, is remembered by the Chair. At that time, as the Chair thinks, Mr. Speaker BLAINE overruled previous decisions. That is the present impression of the Chair. He would be glad, if he could, to have this matter postponed or not ruled on, until a thorough examination of previous rulings could be made. The Chair would add that in his position as a mere locum tenens he craves the forbearance of the House in rulings so frequently eo instanti.

Mr. RANDALL. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the subject was recommitted does not involve the decision of the question at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I raised the point of order against the reception of the report from the Committee on Printing, and that point did not come too late, as it has been frequently held that it is in time to raise the point of order until after the proposition has been read.

Mr. RANDALL. This question was considered yesterday on a report from the Committee on Printing. That committee reported for the action of the House three resolutions, two of which were adopted and the third recommitted to the Committee on Printing with instructions. In my judgment, it is now entirely competent for the gentleman from Mississippi, from the Committee on Printing, to report back that resolution under the instructions with which it was recommitted. To avoid all question, however, he has moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was recommitted. That has been done time and again.

Mr. HALE. I rise to the point of order that the gentleman from Mississippi cannot now take this method of bringing the matter up on a motion to reconsider. Yesterday the subject was recommitted to the Committee on Printing, and that committee has to-day already reported it back. It has therefore gone beyond any stage where they can select the manner of bringing it up by a motion to reconsider. The ruling of the Chair, therefore, must be whether the report of the committee as made by the gentleman from Mississippi can be considered at once unless by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order of the gentleman from Maine. He is evidently right in saying that the committee to-day has reported it back. The gentleman from Mississippi has to-day submitted his report, and therefore it has gone beyond the stage when a motion to reconsider will lie. The committee having reported the matter back, it comes up before the House on that report. It being before us, can a motion to reconsider its recommitment be in order?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The subject was up by unanimous consent yesterday. The proposition now is to report again from the Committee on Printing. It is now a new proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine, as it is evidently correct. The committee having reported the subject back to the House, the motion (according to his point of order) to reconsider the recommittal does not lie.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair say the gentleman from Mississippi has no right to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was recommitted to that committee on yesterday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not after the committee has reported the subject back to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The question of order was raised against the reception of the report, and to avoid that difficulty the motion to reconsider was made by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have raised the point of order against the reception of the report, and that point of order is still pending, the Speaker not having decided it.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order has been raised against the reception of the report, that it was not an ordinary report from the Committee on Printing, which could be made at any time, but that the report was of a proposition changing existing law, which could only come in by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This matter was before the House without objection, by unanimous consent, when the point of order was made against it.

Mr. SINGLETON. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. No; the report and then the motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I objected to the reception of the report as soon as it was stated to the House, and my point of order is perfectly good until the proposition was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This report is before the House, and will come up to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. RANDALL'S motion was agreed to; and then (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 2604) to incorporate the Suburban Railroad Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 2881) to authorize the establishment of a certain free public highway in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

ROBERT SMALLS.

Mr. MORTON. Although it is not in order at this time, as I see the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] in his seat I should like to enter a motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to a report made by him yesterday from the Committee on Naval Affairs adversely on the petition of Robert Smalls, of South Carolina, praying an allowance of prize-money for the capture of the steamer Planter in 1862. If there is no objection on the part of the Senator, I move to have the vote by which the report was concurred in reconsidered, and that the petition be recommitted to the committee in order that an additional statement may be presented in regard to the claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made by unanimous consent.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the memorial of Messrs. Bushwell & Dewell, and other citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, remonstrating against any change in the law regulating the mode of packing tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented the petition of George G. Stillman and others, of Westerly, Rhode Island, praying an amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill authorizing an appropriation to complete the improvement in Little Narraganset Bay, as recommended by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the jail accommodations of the District of Columbia, reported a bill (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail in Judiciary Square to grounds near to the Washington Asylum for the use of the District; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 308) for the relief of B. D. Morton, of Clarkesville, Virginia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Matthew Callaghan, praying compensation for having originated and furnished the Post-Office Department with the plan now in use for the return to the writer of letters not delivered to the person addressed, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 702) to change the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 841) for the relief of Bayse N. Westcott, to report it back adversely. My colleague on the committee [Mr. CONOVER] desires to make a minority report, and therefore I ask that the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. CONOVER. I present the views of the minority to go with the bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred thirteen petitions of citizens of New York, late soldiers in the Union Army, praying for an amendment to the pension laws so as to extend the time in which to make application for arrears of pensions to July 4, 1876, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1944) granting a pension to Njram W. Pratt, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel P. Harbin, of Georgia, praying compensation for certain property seized and taken possession of by United States troops during the late war, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harbin, of Georgia.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on Claims. I will state for the information of the chairman of the committee that a bill was originally introduced for the relief of Mr. Woodward and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and by them returned and the case transferred to the Committee on Claims. The object of the bill which I now introduce is to correct an error in the bill which is already before the Committee on Claims.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 845) for the relief of W. H. Woodward, of Indianola, Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 847) for the relief of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That the papers relative to the application of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, it was Ordered, That Elizabeth M. Dittoe have leave to withdraw her petition and accompanying papers from the files of the Senate.

SALMON FISHERIES ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the extent and condition of the salmon fisheries on the Columbia River in Oregon and Washington Territory, and report to the Senate, by bill or otherwise, such measure as, in its judgment, is expedient and proper for the regulation of such fisheries and the artificial hatching of salmon in such river.

CLAIMS FOR ARMY SUPPLIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1218, of which I spoke yesterday, stating the importance of action upon it at the very earliest moment.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very well understood that the legislative session was extended half an hour longer this morning on my motion, my purpose being to call up a bill very important in reference to my own State, which will not lead to much discussion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state to the Senator from California that this bill will lead to no discussion at all. It was reported at the last session of Congress, and it has come to us from the House of Representatives at this session. It includes claims reported from the Treasury Department eighteen months ago.

Mr. SARGENT. I think there are a large number of items in the bill, are there not?

Mr. WRIGHT. It will take no longer to read the bill now than at any other time, and it is a matter of great importance.

Mr. SARGENT. I only hope that I may have some time during the morning hour to call up the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will cheerfully assist the Senator in getting up his bill. I do not think there will be any trouble about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has named.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress, under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LICK OBSERVATORY.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 677.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 677) granting a site for an observatory to the trustees of the Lick Observatory of the astronomical department of the University of California was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section recites that James Lick, of San Francisco, California, has by deed of trust given a large sum of money for the erection and equipment of an observatory, dedicating the same to the astronomical department of the University of California for scientific and educational purposes, and has selected Mount Hamilton, in the county of Santa Clara, as the site for the observatory, and which is situate on the public lands of the United States, in township 7 south and range 3 east, Mount Diablo meridian, and reserves from sale or disposal under the general laws of the United States section 9, the north half of section 10, the south half of section 3, the fractional north half of section 16, and the fractional section 17, in that township.

Section 2 grants so much of said land as is not already granted or disposed of by the United States, to wit, section 9, the north half of section 10, the south half of section 3, and fractional section 17, to the trustees of the Lick Observatory of the astronomical department of the University of California, with authority and in trust to convey the same to the regents of the University of California, and their successors, in trust for the use and benefit of the astronomical department of the University of California.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to insert at the end of section 2 the following:

Provided, That if the land herein granted shall be used for any other purpose than the site of said observatory, and the necessary purposes in connection therewith, the same shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In line 15 of section 1, I move to strike out the words "the fractional north half of section 16." It is not granted by the bill, but reserved for school purposes. I see no object in retaining the words, and therefore move to strike them out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH. I move to strike out section 3 of the bill. It is unnecessary here; but it is the usual formality in California to provide that an act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. SARGENT. That section should go out.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the last section read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read section 2 of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to inquire if there is a provision which requires the land to be used exclusively for the purpose, and reserves the right to withdraw the grant if it be not?

Mr. SARGENT. There is.

The Chief Clerk read the following amendment made to the bill:

Provided, That if the land herein granted shall be used for any other purpose than the site of said observatory, and the necessary purposes in connection therewith, the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK OF PITTSBURGH.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2018.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2018) to authorize the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to improve certain real estate was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh shall have power and authority to hold, improve, and lease that lot or piece of ground situate on Fifth avenue and Diamond street, in the city of Pittsburgh, adjoining the property owned and used by the corporation as its banking-house; the lot, the improvement of which is authorized, having been owned by the institution during its existence under a State charter and since its organization as a national bank. No funds of the bank, except its surplus beyond the amount required to be retained by section 5199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are to be applied to said improvement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI-ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee heretofore appointed by the Senate to investigate the late election in Mississippi be instructed to investigate also the late alleged killing of people and outrages committed near the Mississippi and Louisiana line, and on and near Bayou Tunica, and on Red River; and that, for this purpose, the committee shall have all the power and authority conferred by the original resolution for their appointment.

I should like to read in connection with the resolution the following dispatch received by Governor Kellogg, who is now in the city, late last night from H. C. Clarke, his private secretary:

NEW ORLEANS, May 17, 1876.

To Governor KELLOGG,
Willard's Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Watson, supervisor registration, Swaizie's son, and other colored fugitives from Feliciana, arrived; details horrible; two young colored girls taken from church at Ivens place two miles Mississippi line, Sunday, and ravished to death by young white men from Mississippi. About six white men known to be killed, and nearly sixty colored men hanged or shot up to Tuesday night. At Bayou Tunica four hundred colored and about the same number whites are under arms, the Bayou between them, colored men resisting passage of Bayou by white regulators. If committee comes, cannot they be instructed to take testimony?

H. C. CLARKE.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Calendar be now taken up for unobjected cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is some necessity for acting on a bill authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, which has been reported for some time. If it is objected to, I will not insist on it now.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object; but it occurs to me that if we go to the Calendar we shall get all the unobjected cases out of the way; and there are a great many of them. I will not object to this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up House bill No. 2441.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 2, line 8, after the word "creditor," to strike out "on his own behalf, or;" after the word "and" in the same line, to insert "of all," and in line 11, after the word "district," to strike out "within which any of the shareholders may reside or be found, or," so as to read:

That when any national-banking association shall have gone into liquidation under the provisions of section 5220 of said statutes, the individual liability of the shareholders provided for by section 5151 of said statutes may be enforced by any creditor of such association, by bill in equity, in the nature of a creditors' bill, brought by such creditor, on behalf of himself and of all other creditors of the association, against the shareholders thereof, in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district in which such association may have been located or established.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, after the word "on" in line 17 to insert:

Or, if no newspaper is there published, in the newspaper published nearest thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourth section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 4. That the Comptroller may, if, in his judgment, the interests of creditors or of shareholders of national banks which are in the hands of receivers will be promoted thereby, invest the money of such associations which may be on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the Comptroller, in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, which may be subsequently sold by him, and the interest accruing on such bonds, together with the principal thereof, be distributed among the creditors and shareholders, with the avails of the other assets, as prescribed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [5] 4, line 5, to insert after the word "shall" the words "neglect or;" so as to read:

That if any shareholder or shareholders of such bank shall neglect or refuse, after three months' notice, to pay the assessment as provided in this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in section [7] 6 the proviso at the end of the section, in the following words:

Provided, That such banks shall not be required to have a paid-in capital exceeding $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 8, in the following words:

SEC. 8. That so much of section 553, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, as authorizes the organization of savings-banks within said District, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps Senators who have listened to the reading of this bill do not need any explanation, and those who have not do not want any. Therefore, perhaps I had better say nothing about it. I will simply remark that the bill has been very carefully prepared at the Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency and has passed the House of Representatives. Its chief object is to extend the cases in which receivers of national banks may be appointed. I can refer to the law and show the exact changes made; but I do not know that it is necessary. The principal object is to authorize the appointment of receivers of national banks in cases not now provided for by law.

Mr. ALLISON. Who appoints these receivers?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Comptroller, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, just as in other cases. I will say that now under existing law receivers can only be appointed on a failure to make the capital equal to the legal minimum, and also when the reserve is not made good, and also when the bank fails to redeem its notes. Senators can see that there are many cases when a bank may be utterly insolvent and yet because its notes are not presented the Comptroller has no power to appoint a receiver, and in many cases great injustice has been done, and banks in a crippled and failing condition and actually known to be insolvent have still gone on doing business. This bill extends the law to a number of cases where the insolvency is shown to the Comptroller, or where judgments have been had in courts of record and not paid, and also when a bank fails to comply with the statutes generally, especially section 5239 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to make one or two inquiries about this bill. In the first place, section 2 of the bill authorizes the individual liability of the shareholders to be enforced by a bill in equity filed by any creditor in the nature of a creditor's bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my colleague that that does not apply except when a bank chooses to go into voluntary liquidation, and in such cases banks being a little crippled have gone into voluntary liquidation. Under the statute as it stands the Comptroller cannot enforce the individual liability until the assets are exhausted, and thus they get time, unjustly in many cases, for the payment of their debts, when, if he had the power or if the creditors had the power to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders, the matter might have been wound up in thirty or sixty days.

Mr. THURMAN. It is to compel a resort to this individual liability before exhausting the assets—is that the object of section 2?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only in cases where the bank stops voluntarily and is in process of voluntary liquidation—in such cases the individual liability, under the limitations of this section, may be enforced by a bill in equity brought by a creditor in behalf of himself and all the other creditors of the association against the shareholders.

Mr. THURMAN. It seems to me that it will leave a very great ambiguity, because the section of the bank charter referred to—5151—is not perhaps so clear for the courts to decide upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Fifty-two hundred and thirty-nine.

Mr. THURMAN. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance is whether or not this bill makes it certain when the shareholder shall be compelled to respond under the individual-liability clause of the bank charter. In respect to individual liability, where it is provided for generally, the decisions of the courts have been very contradictory in different States. I do not know that they have been under this banking act, for I am not familiar with the decisions under it. In some States it has been held that that makes the stockholder liable as if he were a mere partner, and an action at law may be brought against him. In others it has been held that he can be proceeded against by a creditor's bill and compelled to pay without waiting for the assets of the corporation to be exhausted. In others, as in my own State in the last decision made, it has been held that the assets of the corporation must be first exhausted. I do not know how this will be construed. It seems to me it ought to be clear one way or the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. As we have but five minutes' time, I will state to my colleague that this section does not change in the slightest degree the amount of the liability, the nature of it, or the mode of prosecuting it; it simply says that when a bank chooses voluntarily to go into liquidation, its creditors may file a creditor's bill to compel the individual stockholders to respond to their individual liability. It does not change the case at all as to other banks that are either wound up by a receiver or in process of liquidation under the law. I do not think there can be any objection to this section. The power they have had heretofore has been abused.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill will leave it to the courts, just as it is now. If the committee are satisfied with it in that way, I do not know that I shall interpose any objection; although it does seem to me that it would have been better to have made that individual-liability clause clear, so that the courts might know whether they could give judgement at once upon the individual-liability clause or whether they must wait until the assets were exhausted.

I wish, however, to call attention to another section of this bill that I am not quite sure is not a little questionable. Section 5 provides—

That all United States officers charged with the receipt or disbursement of public moneys, and all officers of national banks, shall stamp or write in plain letters the word "counterfeit," "altered," or "worthless" upon all fraudulent notes issued in the form of, and intended to circulate as, money, which shall be presented at their places of business; and if such officers shall wrongfully stamp any genuine note of the United States or of the national banks, they shall, upon presentation, redeem such notes at the face value thereof.

I am not aware of any such provision as that in the law now, though there may be. I am a little apprehensive that it might be dangerous. I am not opposed to the section, because it might tend to prevent an inflation of the currency; for I am opposed to inflation, and especially to inflation by means of counterfeit paper. I am not opposed to it on that ground; but this makes it the duty of every bank officer and every receiving and disbursing officer of the United States, when a note is presented, to decide whether it is altered, counterfeit, or worthless, and stamp it right on the spot as such. I think that would pretty effectually stop its circulation; but if the man whose note has thus been stamped is not satisfied with that, he may present it again and prove, I suppose, or bring suit and prove that the officer stamped it wrongfully or without sufficient cause, and then the officer is to redeem the note. How it is to circulate with this stamp on it, after the officer has redeemed it, I do not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. He can send it in and get his money for it.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know how that is to be done. It seems to me that it is a very questionable provision.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WRIGHT. On Monday last the bill (H. R. No. 2829) for the relief of Ariel K. Eaton and James D. Jenkins, which was received from the House of Representatives, was by mistake referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I move that that order be reversed and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after its passage the rank of the Paymaster-General of the United States Army shall be brigadier-general; and no pay and allowances shall be made to him other than from the date of appointment under the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better lie over, as it was only reported to-day.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill has been reported from the Military Committee once before and recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate is suspended, and pursuant to order the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment having adjourned, resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of April 10, 1876, a report of the commissioners of the sinking fund of the District, showing the amount of certificates of indebtedness issued by virtue of acts of the Assembly of the District of Columbia and of Congress, and also the amount of assessments made in pursuance of said acts to secure the payment of the certificates; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, (at five o'clock and four minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. POWELL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Elizabeth J. Scott, being an application for a pension, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for two weeks on account of important business.

NORTH CAROLINA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to an appropriation for the benefit of the North Carolina Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers and of the commanding general, Division of the Pacific, on the bill (H. R. No. 1301) relative to the Presidio reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC GROUNDS OF WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of March 9, the report of Colonel O. E. Babcock, together with itemized vouchers, &c., pertaining to the public grounds of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting documents relative to the extension of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is requested by the Clerk of the House to lay before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIR: My attention has been called to the following telegram from this city to the Chicago Inter-Ocean of the 15th instant:

"THE NEXT MAN.

"Adams, the Clerk, is said to be the next man to have trouble. A member of Congress claims to have in his possession facts, which he will make public soon, to show that he (the Clerk) has been selling his appointments at sums ranging from $100 to $500."

I regret to obtrude this matter upon the attention of the House of Representatives; but, as these charges affect my honor as a man and my conduct as a responsible officer of this body, I feel impelled to do so, lest my silence under the circumstances might be misconstrued.

I therefore respectfully request that the House shall direct a committee to make an immediate and exhaustive investigation of this subject, and I challenge all persons who profess to have any knowledge or information of any official misconduct on my part to appear and communicate the same to said committee, to the end that the truth or falsity of such charges may be determined at once and forever.

I will here add—and I do so with the absolute and defying confidence of a man conscious of the perfect rectitude of his official conduct—that all such charges are infamous slanders, having not a shadow of foundation in truth.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ADAMS.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Speaker pro tempore House of Representatives.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I offer the following resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the communication from the Clerk of this House just read be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to make a thorough investigation into the matters therein contained, and report thereon at the earliest practicable day, and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and make report at any time.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I doubt not, sir, that the House will readily accede to the request of its officer and pass the resolution I have submitted. This scandalous charge has been spread all over the land in newspapers, and it is but an act of simple justice to Mr. Adams that it be investigated.

I have known him, sir, for many years, and he has always had my unquestioning, undoubting, absolute trust. I believe him to be a gentleman possessed of the highest sense of honor, of incorruptible integrity; and I am sure that this estimate of his character is shared by all his friends. He was for eight years a representative on this floor from Kentucky, and he has in many other ways received manifestations of the confidence and regard of his fellow-citizens. His friends believe it impossible that he could have been guilty of anything unworthy in his official conduct. They believe that he will come out of this investigation without the shade of a shadow of suspicion upon his reputation, and that nothing that can be produced against him can be tortured into the semblance even of misconduct in office. Malignity has gone on its stealthy, hungry hunt along the gutters of calumny, hoping to be able to hook up something foul with which to smirch the escutcheon of this man. The charge we have heard is the product of that nasty search. It is a grave one. If true, he is disgraced and should be driven from his office; but, if false, he should be vindicated. Mr. Adams confronts the accusation. He defies the accuser. He demands the proof. Let it be produced, or the instigator of the vile slander stand condemned and despised.

I move the previous question.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he has any idea who the instigator of this charge is.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. The paragraph quoted in the letter of the Clerk refers to a Congressman.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to withhold the call for the previous question for a moment that I may say a word in regard to the committee to which it is proposed that this communication shall be referred.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. Of course I do not wish to say a word against the investigation that is proposed. But I ask the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky and the House to the constitution of the committee to which this subject is proposed to be referred.

The Committee on Rules is appointed for the purpose of considering one distinct subject relating to the order of transacting the business of the House, the order of the course of legislation; and while of course gentlemen on that committee cannot object to considering any other subject referred to it, inasmuch as they were selected for particular reasons and on account of the positions they had held heretofore in this House either as its officers or as controlling its business, it seems better on general consideration that this subject be referred to a special committee, it being an important investigation and which should be made with as much speed as possible.

But there is another reason. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, who is the Speaker of the House, is absent. If he were present it would certainly occur to every gentleman that the Speaker of the House, on any consideration, ought not to be made the chairman of a committee of investigation on account of the powerful influence which he would naturally exert as an officer of the House. It would naturally suggest itself to every member that that powerful influence ought not to be thrown in the one scale or the other. As the Speaker is absent the committee cannot be charged with the consideration of this matter before his place is filled. I believe there are five members of the committee, and one being absent, the committee is equally divided. In the absence of the Speaker the Speaker pro tempore would be chairman of the committee, not absolutely, but by the general course, as it happens that the member of the House who is now Speaker pro tempore is also a member of the committee. The committee therefore is reduced to three members, the Speaker pro tempore, and two of the members are ex-Speakers of the House. It is not such a committee that ought to be charged with the very important duty of considering this matter, affecting not only the character of one of the principal officers of the House, but to a great extent the character of the House itself. Now I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that this matter be referred to a special committee of five or seven members, to be appointed by the Chair, and with the due consideration of all circumstances connected with it and its importance, and then the House will be entirely satisfied with its judgment, and I hope the House will make that change in the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I concur very fully with the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Committee on Rules have already one investigation before them, and we find great difficulty in getting a quorum. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has stated, the Speaker is absent, and another member of the committee is not well and confined to his house. The truth is that as a member of that committee I have not time to attend to it. I have been unable to meet with the committee in the investigation already ordered because I am on another committee, and my presence there as its presiding officer is absolutely necessary. I concur with the gentleman that this matter should be referred to a special committee.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I am entirely indifferent as to what committee shall have charge of this matter, and in view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts I will modify the resolution and propose the reference of these charges to a select committee of five to be appointed by the Chair; and in that connection I desire to say that standing as I am in intimate relations with the Clerk of the House I do not wish to serve on that committee, and I am authorized by him to say that he would prefer that no democratic Kentuckian should be on that committee.

The question was taken on the resolution, as modified, and it was agreed to.

LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. GAUSE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1253) granting to the State of Missouri all the lands therein selected as swamp and overflowed land.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order that that bill should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that point of order. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the bill is not before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not before the House, objection being made.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first business in order this morning is the consideration, as unfinished business, of the report from the Committee on Printing in relation to the Government Printing Office.

A point of order is pending concerning the reception and consideration of this report.

The Chair begs the attention of the House to this matter as of considerable importance concerning the rules of the House. It is important because it affects several committees which under the rules have "leave to report at any time," and, further, because it affects current legislation—its order and priority. To illustrate by a few queries: The Committee of Elections may "report at any time;" but is not that limited to contested-election cases and thus privileged? Can it, however, under the rule report a general election law? The Committee on Enrolled Bills has a similar privilege; but is not the limit fixed upon reporting enrolled bills only?

What is the condition of the report upon which this point of order is raised?

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE,] chairman of the Committee on Printing, on the 12th instant, submitted a report from that committee in relation to the Government Printing Office. That report was read at length and recommitted to the same committee. On Tuesday, the 16th instant, the House reconsidered the vote by which the report was recommitted to the committee, discussed the report nearly four hours, adopted two of the three resolutions submitted in that report, and recommitted the third resolution to the committee with instructions to modify the same. The vote by which the resolution was recommitted was reconsidered and the motion to reconsider laid on the table. The report was prevented from being brought back upon a motion to reconsider the vote of recommitment.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] on yesterday reported back the resolution with certain modifications. In fact his committee only obeyed the instructions of the House.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] thereupon made the point of order that the privilege of the committee to report at any time extended only to reference of their reports to the Committee of the Whole.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] also raised the same point at a subsequent stage of the proceeding.

The Chair was inclined to rule promptly that the committee had the right to report at any time, and that the report was properly before the House for consideration, as consideration and report go together. (Barclay, 187.) The matter being of unusual consequence, the Chair desired to examine heedfully the question presented, as well as the reasons and precedents.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] temporarily complicated the question by moving to reconsider the vote by which the report was recommitted to the Committee on Printing. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] made the point of order that the committee having made the report recommitted to them, the motion to reconsider the vote of recommitment was not in order; which point of order was sustained by the Chair. In this ruling the Chair was clearly right, and for another reason besides that stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] namely, that there had been on Saturday a prevailing motion to table the question of reconsideration of the recommitment.

The present occupant of the chair has carefully looked into the subject and examined the authorities and precedents. He has read the decision of Mr. Speaker BLAINE in the case alluded to yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] It is found in the Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, page 2478. He has also read the reply and speech of Mr. Beatty at that time. (See Globe of same session, page 2408.) He has also examined other decisions which seem to differ from that of Mr. Speaker BLAINE.

While he believes now as he did then, that that decision under the strict construction of the rules was correct, he is of opinion that the present matter involves and presents an entirely different and exceptional question. At that time and in that case the origin of the rule and the necessity out of which it grew sanctioned the decision. The rule is as old as the Thirtieth Congress. Its author was Mr. Henley, of Indiana. It was intended to save a large amount of money which would otherwise be paid for additional composition of documents, &c., when matter had been taken down and after extra numbers were ordered. The rule was founded in convenience and economy, and was not to be enlarged to comprehend the report at any time of general legislation.

Frequently this rule has received a too literal interpretation, which led to its abuse. In fact Mr. Beatty quoted many occasions when Mr. Speaker BLAINE himself allowed the committee to report other matters than those strictly belonging to the current printing of the House. The Tributes to Abraham Lincoln and their distribution by law was instanced. This instance is found in the Globe, second session Forty-first Congress, page 3118. But in that case the resolution had been referred to the committee. The subject-matter was committed to the committee by the House itself and the Chair allowed the report to be made "at any time." Therein it is akin to this present case.

Inasmuch as the original resolution of investigation in this case gave no authority to report or suggest general legislation, the Chair is of opinion that the point of order now raised would have held good, if made at the proper time, i. e., when the report was first made on the 12th instant. But he is also of opinion that the report having been received, read, and, with full knowledge of its purport, recommitted to the committee, again reported on the 16th, considered, and partly disposed of, again recommitted to the committee with instructions embodying the wish and conclusion of the House, it is now in order. The instructions so enlarged the original jurisdiction of the committee that the point of order that the report is not a privileged one does not now lie.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] stated yesterday that Mr. Speaker BLAINE in making his decision recurred to the origin of the rule and fortified himself by several important precedents, among others, decisions of Speakers Winthrop and Cobb.

The Chair was aware of the decisions. He stated yesterday that his impression was that Speaker BLAINE had overruled them. Whether his decision, which was made that of the House by a resolution from Mr. BANKS sustaining it, (Journal, April 16, 1872, page 697,) overruled that of his eminent predecessors or not, is not very material to the present decision. They are referred to only to show that they are not absolutely necessary to the present ruling, either as reason or authority. In certain respects, they confirm the present ruling of the Chair, while in other respects the decision of Mr. Speaker BLAINE does not conflict with it. For all that appears in his own decision, Mr. Speaker BLAINE could consistently coincide with that of the Chair. The Clerk will read the opinions of Speakers Winthrop and Cobb.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker stated the question. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to claim for the Speaker the discretionary power to say what character of reports the Committee on Printing might make under their general leave to report at any time. The Chair overruled the point of order, and disclaimed any such power. The rule was express that the Committee on Printing might report at any time, without reference to the nature or character of the report.—Speaker Winthrop.

The SPEAKER. * * * The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Burt] submits as a point of order that under the rules of the House the gentleman from Mississippi is not entitled to make this report as a privileged question. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the twenty-first rule of the House provides that it shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time. The rule places no restriction whatever upon the subject-matter to be reported; and, in the opinion of the Chair, it is limited only to the fact whether or not the subject be legitimately before that committee.—Speaker Cobb.

In the decision of Mr. Speaker BLAINE he did not hesitate to declare that he differed from these ex-Speakers; and that he took the responsibility of overruling them. The present acting Speaker would hesitate before following such an example, even as against one ex-Speaker. Nor is it necessary for the decision of the present point of order.

It will be observed that both these eminent Speakers were of opinion that the Committee on Printing possessed the right to report at any time "without reference to the nature or character of the report." Mr. Cobb limits his ruling by the fact, significant in the present case, whether or not the subject was legitimately before that committee. The Chair presumes that no member of the House will deny that the committee had obtained jurisdiction of the subject of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker BLAINE in his decision urged as a strong reason against the privilege claimed by Mr. Beatty, the chairman of the House Committee on Printing in the Forty-second Congress, that if it was conceded the House might suddenly and without warning have precipitated upon it bills embracing extraordinary and general legislation. He held that the rules, which were largely for the protection of minorities, were intended to prevent such legislation. Certainly in the present case it cannot be urged that the House was not fully aware of the legislation proposed in the report under consideration, and therefore that portion of the argument made by Mr. Speaker BLAINE in making that decision does not apply in this case.

The sections of the pending resolution for the Committee of Appropriations to consider, reported by Mr. VANCE, the chairman of the Printing Committee, comprehend a large sphere of repealing and original legislation. They create an office of responsibility. They provide an extensive scheme of Government printing, binding, &c., for the legislative as well as the Executive Departments. At first sight they would seem to be ruled out by the decision of Speaker BLAINE; but of their general tenor was not the House fully advised by the report on the 12th, as well as by the lengthy debates, which followed? Did not the House deliberately consider and reconsider, and finally recommit them; and that, too, with instructions? No member or committee was surprised or embarrassed by this last report of the Committee on Printing. It was acting only perfunctorily and almost formally, in answer to the express call of the House, which gave them special jurisdiction.

The reasoning of the decision of Ex-Speaker BLAINE, therefore, in 1872, cannot be tortured into sustaining this point of order. This last report does not, except by the action of the House itself disturb or crowd out the right of other committees on other questions. It is only by the consent of the House, deliberately given, that the privileges of other committees can be disturbed by this privilege of the Printing Committee to report at any time on other matters besides the "current printing."

The Chair repeats that while he is of opinion that the present case is essentially different from that decided by Mr. Speaker BLAINE, he is clear that the House, having full knowledge of the report now in question, committed the same to the committee. It thereby cured any defect or lack of jurisdiction as an original proposition.

Further, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES, long a member of several privileged committees, and frequently acting Speaker, was of opinion that the reference of a bill or resolution to the committee gave it a broader jurisdiction than it originally possessed. He could not avoid this conclusion, as it had been held by eminent authority. In reply to Mr. Beatty he said:

I do not doubt that the House can give the committee a new or extended jurisdiction; but in the absence of that, it must be perfectly apparent that the right to report at any time can only be co-extensive with the jurisdiction of the committee; and a reference to the rule creating the committee shows the limited character of its authority, in the absence of any new or additional authority given by the House.—Globe, page 2480, second session Forty-second Congress.

Fortified by the reasoning of Ex-Speaker BLAINE in his decision, and by Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, in his remarks, as well as by other rulings in other cases in conflict with that decision on other points not here relevant; fortified by the decisions of Ex-Speakers Winthrop and Cobb, which apply to this case even if they go further than they should; strengthened by the peculiar situation of this question, because of its most deliberate consideration by the House and its recommittal to the committee, as well as by the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] himself, who made the point of order, that when this recommittal was made the resolution could be reported at any time, the Chair overrules the point of order.

The report is therefore before the House; and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. One word, Mr. Speaker. You have quoted me as making a statement that is directly contrary to what I did say. I said the Committee on Printing should not have the right to report at any time; I am in the RECORD made to say directly the opposite.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read from the RECORD.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know that the RECORD makes me say so, but the RECORD is wrong; and as the correction of the RECORD is not a question of privilege, I have not had the opportunity to make the correction

Mr. HOAR. I am entirely satisfied with the decision of the Chair. As I stated yesterday, I raised the point of order, not for the purpose of embarrassing this resolution at all, but simply because it was so grave a matter. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the Chair now is this: I understand that the present ruling is not in conflict with the ruling of Speaker BLAINE, but stands upon its own ground. The ruling of Speaker BLAINE, however, is not the real authority in favor of the position which he took; but the authority is the decision of the House on the appeal from his ruling. Unless I am mistaken, there was no appeal in the cases referred to by the Chair where decisions were made by Speakers Winthrop and Cobb. I am not sure about that, but the Chair perhaps has observed whether that is the case or not. Under the ruling of Speaker BLAINE, in the Congress before the last, his decision derived its authority as a precedent from the fact that it became the decision of the House on appeal, and as such is by the rule expressly required to be recorded at the end of the Journal. I do not say this as contravening anything that the Chair has now said, for I do not understand that the Chair has said anything in conflict with that decision, but rather in accord with it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair confirmed his decision with what Mr. Speaker BLAINE said.

Mr. HOLMAN. On this question of order I desire to say a single word. There are two other committees of the House, the one intrusted with the duty of raising revenue, and the other of making appropriations to carry on the Government, which committees are, by the rules of the House, invested with the right to report at any time. I believe, however, it is generally understood that they may report at any time only upon the subject-matters of the revenues of the Government and the appropriations to carry on the Government. As this is a question of the very highest importance in connection with the current business of this House, I trust that the ruling of the Chair may be considered to be perfectly consistent with the assumption that those two committees will still possess the right to report at any time only upon those subject-matters which immediately pertain to their deliberation, and not upon any incidental matters which from time to time may be referred to them. I understand that the ruling of the Chair is perfectly consistent with that view, for it is very clear that the House would not desire to confer upon the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of Ways and Means the right to report at any time upon the multitude of incidental matters not directly connected with the revenues of the Government and appropriations from the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to suggest in that connection that it has been repeatedly ruled that the Committee on Appropriations could not report at any time anything but one of the twelve regular appropriation bills; and last session it was ruled by the Speaker that when we had introduced and carried through a deficiency appropriation bill an additional deficiency appropriation bill was not under our privilege; that we had exhausted our function when we had reported one general deficiency bill, and could not claim the right to report subsequently another deficiency bill at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The rule creating the Committee of Ways and Means expressly limits that committee to reports upon the subject-matter of the public revenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not gone further in his decision than the subject before the House requires. When other subjects come up upon which his ruling is required he will studiously endeavor to make that ruling according to the usual construction of the rules.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say a word or two on this question of the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SINGLETON. I believe I am entitled to the floor, the Chair having decided that the report of the committee is in order.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will allow me——

Mr. SINGLETON. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. BANKS. Then, for the purpose of getting an opportunity to say what I wish to say, I will appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question before the House is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this House?

Mr. BANKS. I do not propose in any way to set myself in opposition to the decision of the Chair upon this question. I want, however, to call the attention of the House to one or two facts connected with it which ought to be understood, and upon which, if the statement of the Chair shall be accepted as an absolute rule in all cases, the House will some time find itself in very great difficulty.

The decisions of Mr. Speaker Winthrop and Mr. Speaker Cobb upon this question do not apply, I think, to the business of the House and its rules at the present time. A law has been passed which requires that every proposition relating to the printing of documents shall be referred to a committee, not by the House, but by the officers of the respective Houses. The House exercises no discretion and has no power in effecting this reference. A large class of papers are referred to the Committee on Printing by the Clerk. This was not the law at the time those decisions were made; and therefore, so far as the rules existing then and now apply, the condition of the matter is not the same. When the House refers a matter to a committee—the Committee on Printing or any other—of course that committee has all the rights upon the question referred to it which are given to that committee by the rules. But in this case the House does not refer these questions to the Committee on Printing; they are referred in one case by the law and in the other by the rules of the House. Rule 100 provides that a large number of cases shall be referred to the Committee on Printing by order of the Clerk. Now, if the House refers a matter of general legislation to the Committee on Printing, that committee upon that matter should be held to the proceedings under the rules affecting all other committees in regard to subjects of general legislation. If this be not the rule now, it ought to be changed. Otherwise many subjects appropriate to the business of other committees will be referred to the special committees invested with the high privilege of presenting their reports at any moment, irrespective of the business which may occupy the House. It is a high privilege, which ought to be limited to privileged subjects of legislation, and the printing of documents presents a question of this character. It must often be decided without delay, and the rule is framed to secure this result. Propositions to change the general laws relating to the general subject of printing are not of this character, and ought not to enjoy this exclusive privilege.

Let me state a case which will show the House that I am right upon this point. There is a great difference of opinion upon the question of currency; and I have observed that gentlemen on all sides and from different sections have been indisposed to admit propositions that should subject the House to a decision of this subject by a majority vote. Now, if the ruling of the Chair be correct, to-morrow morning there may be brought before this House from the Committee on Printing a bill on the subject of currency, or a bill changing fundamental provisions of our law upon any other matter; and the House will have lost the control of the question, because it must be remembered a petition gives a committee jurisdiction of a subject of legislation as completely as the reference of a bill. A member may file a petition with the Clerk; he need not publish it in the newspapers; no member of the House will know what subject is embraced in it; and if that petition goes to the Committee on Printing, or another having the same exclusive right, giving that committee jurisdiction of the subject, as it will under the ruling of the Chair, and that committee having the right to report at any time, the House will be compelled to act upon any subject, no matter what it may be, at an instant's notice without preparation and without any previous consent to the introduction of the matter.

Now, that ought not to be. I do not mean to set this statement against the decision of the Chair; but I suggest to the Chair and to the House that there ought to be some revision of this matter so that every committee shall be held in regard to its privilege to exactly that line of conduct which the House understands and directs to be pursued. I withdraw the appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would say that he especially avoided any difficulty such as is suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] The ruling of the Chair is based on the recommittal of this third resolution to the Committee on Printing, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. SINGLETON. I now ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred back one of the resolutions reported by said committee, containing an instruction to the Committee on Appropriations to insert certain sections in the sundry civil bill to be by them hereafter reported to this House, having had the same under consideration, have instructed me to report back the said resolution and bill accompanying it, with the following amendments:

In the second line of said resolution, to strike out the words "instructed to embody," and insert in lieu thereof the words "requested to inquire into the expediency of embodying."

Strike from section —, being by count the ninth section of the bill reported with the resolution, all after the word "for," at the end of the fourth line in said section, down to and including the word "Congress," in the seventh line, and insert in lieu thereof "and during the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress;" so that said section will read as follows:

SEC. —. That from and after the close of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress the printing and binding of the proceedings and debates of Congress in the same form as they now appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be done by Franklin Rives, of Washington City, for and during the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, upon the terms stated in his proposal, &c.

At the end of said section, insert the following:

And provided further, That after the expiration of the said second session of the Forty-fourth Congress the printing and binding of the proceedings and debates of Congress in the same form as they now appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall be let by the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses of Congress by contract, in writing, to the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, after advertising for one month during the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress for bids in at least one public newspaper in each of the cities of Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York, specifying in said advertisements the work for which bids are invited; and the said Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses shall take bond and approved security in the sum of $100,000, payable to the United States, for the faithful and prompt performance of the contract entered into by said successful bidder or bidders; said contract to cover the work for the two sessions of the Forty-fifth Congress, and to embrace all the provisions as to the character of type, manner of making up the proceedings and debates, size and binding of volumes thereof, paper to be used, stereotype plates or duplicates, and every other stipulation in relation thereto deemed advisable by said Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that the modifications proposed in this report go to the extent that the House, from the tone of the discussion the other day, intended. There is yet retained a provision that the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of this Congress shall be awarded to a particular individual; in other words, it is proposed by legislation to make a contract with an individual named, excluding competition. Now I would like to amend that part of the report so as to provide that the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of this Congress, as well as for subsequent Congresses, shall be open to competition. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] who sits behind me tells me that it will be all right; but in my judgment the way to insure having matters right is to make them right upon the face of the record. I therefore ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to allow me to offer an amendment that the printing of the RECORD for the next session of the present Congress, as well as for future Congresses, shall be open to competition.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will explain the report of the committee, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania can see whether or not his objection will apply.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly I shall be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by the House that the report simply recommends this resolution and the accompanying bill shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration. There is nothing to be determined at this time except the simple question of reference.

The first amendment which was made to the resolution by the Committee on Printing in obedience to the instructions of the House was to strike out the word "instructed" and in lieu thereof to provide that the Committee on Appropriations be requested to inquire into the propriety of embodying certain matters in the sundry civil appropriation bill. To that there can be no objection. It seemed to be the wish of the House when the resolution was recommitted that that should be done.

It will be further remembered that by one of the sections of the bill accompanying the resolution the proposition was made to give to Franklin Rives for six years the printing of the Congressional Globe or CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon terms which he himself submitted. Now that section has been modified to this extent: It is not now proposed to enter into any contract for six years, which the House seemed to think was too long a time and would look like an attempt to bind subsequent Congresses, but that has been modified to the extent that he is only allowed to do the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the short session of the present Congress, and when that time shall have expired then the whole matter is left to the control of the Joint Committee on Printing to advertise for bids and let the contract out to the lowest bidder with good sureties for the proper execution of the work. That is as far as the report goes.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to that, and thinks we ought to advertise and receive bids for the execution of this work during the coming short session of the present Congress. It seems to me we will meet with some difficulty in that regard from the fact that we have hardly time now to attend to it.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling, inferentially or in any other way, to countenance a contract by legislation with any individual that is not open to competition. Secondly, I do not think it right, by implication even, to embarrass the action of the Committee on Appropriations in that respect.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will add but one word.

Mr. RANDALL. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. SINGLETON. Certainly the gentleman can offer his amendment; but I wish to say one word only in regard to that provision of the bill. It will be found from the testimony which has been taken in this case in regard to the public printing that the proposition which is made by Mr. Rives to do the printing is about $16,000 less a session than it has been done for; and it was on that ground we felt inclined to accept the proposition with a view to saving to this Government that amount during each session of Congress. But I wish to say in addition that we have no special interest in Mr. Rives or any other individual. We do not propose to favor him above any one else; but as he made the proposition, and we believe it to be a good one and in the interest of the Government to accept it, we therefore embodied it in our report. I know the chairman of the committee, as well as the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] and myself, are all perfectly willing, indeed anxious, that this whole matter shall be thrown open to competition, so that the public printing shall be done at the least possible cost.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that in anything I have said I have not attempted, nor was it my intention, to reflect on the proposition as reported from the committee, because I believe it to be in the direction of economy to the extent, as the gentleman has stated, of $16,000 a session. But the gentleman will readily see that we should subject ourselves to great criticism if we should attempt even with that reduction to shut off from competition others who might be willing to do it for still less.

I now ask the Clerk to read my amendment. It is to strike out all giving the contract to Mr. Rives, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

The printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the present Congress, as well as for subsequent Congresses, shall be open to competition.

Mr. RANDALL. That is my amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON. I now call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. BALLOU. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SINGLETON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. BALLOU. Mr. Speaker, I assented to this reference in committee because I was unwilling to oppose anything like inquiry, but I think this whole matter is wrong. The gentleman from Mississippi has stated that what is proposed by Mr. Rives is $16,000 less, but, according to the statement of the Congressional Printer, his proposition is $88,000, while Mr. Rives's is $93,000.

But it is said the Congressional Printer underestimates. Now I think it can be shown that the committee have made some mistakes as well as the Printing Office. In relation to the charge for gold-leaf of $57,000 it has been said one-fourth of that was wastage, making $14,000. I understand, however, that there is not more than 20 per cent. of gold-leaf of intrinsic gold value, making the one-quarter less than $3,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish the gentleman would yield to me for just one moment. I want to say that the gold-leaf has nothing in the world to do with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It does not touch this question in any shape or manner whatever.

Mr. BALLOU. It touches the matter of transferring the printing of the RECORD to anybody else. And I wish to state this: If there is a profit—and no private contractors would take the work without a profit—why should not the Government have that profit itself? And if the present Congressional Printer does not do the work as economically as it can be done, then there are men in the country who can do it. And why should not the Government make the saving of the profit that comes from this printing?

Mr. Speaker, this whole matter, in my judgment, has been conducted in an unsafe and wrong manner. You, Mr. Speaker, and the honorable chairman of this committee, and the members of committees of investigation of this House could not stand, and none, if they were as pure as the angels of light, could stand and have charges brought against them by those who had enmity and prejudice and selfishness to minister to, while those who were accused were not able to be present and face the charges. And I say that the Congressional Printer has not had the opportunity of standing up before these witnesses and cross-examining them and defending himself. There is not a criminal in the land, however black his character, but would have a better chance than the Congressional Printer has had in this investigation.

I wish to refer to one of the statements made by the chairman of this committee in his speech the other day. He said:

I refer to Mr. Theodore L. De Vinne, of New York. * * * He examined various samples and kinds of work. For instance, he examined the "Dead-Letter Office sale" I hold in my hand, marked X. I will read from the testimony:

"Question. Make an estimate of the pamphlet marked "X" as you believe it would be made by the printers of New York, Baltimore, or Philadelphia, if they had workmen by the piece, for one thousand copies.

"Answer. The paper for a thousand copies, four and one-third reams, at $8.50 a ream, $36 83; composition of sixty-six pages, at $2.70, $178.20; press-work of five forms, $5 a form, $25; binding of a thousand copies, $6; sum total, $246.03.

"Q. Is this the lowest price, or nearly the lowest price, for which this work could be done?

"A. It is not; this is the price which would be charged by the better class of printers, being charged at what are known as established rates. There are printers in the city who would do it for a much smaller sum."

The answers to these questions are to the point. Now, what did the Congressional Printer charge? He charged $645.75!

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? The charge ($645.75) by the Congressional Printer for the work above referred to was for 10,000 copies, and is made up as follows—I hold the bill in my hand:

Composition, (double-price matter)	$282 20
Press-work, 200 tokens, at seventy-five cents, (which covers folding, gathering, stitching)	150 00
Paper, (42½ reams, at $6.20 1-10)	263 55
	645 75

That is the way in which the total of $645.75 is made up; and this shows that even our committee as well as the Congressional Printer may sometimes make mistakes. And now let me read another statement from the speech of the chairman of the committee. He says:

Here is the report of the Secretary of the Interior, volume 1, for 1875, of which five hundred copies were bound, at a cost of $471.30, one hundred bound in the style which gentlemen can see, and four hundred in cloth. The cloth copies, according to the estimates, cost about twenty cents a volume, which would leave the cost of this bound copy at about $3.90 per volume.

Now, what are the facts? The charge of $471.37 above referred to is made up as follows:

No composition, it being printed at the same time as the regular congressional edition.
Press-work, (which covers folding, &c.)	$93 00
Paper, (31 11-20 reams, at $6.14 4-5)	193 97
Inserting plate-work	4 40
Binding four hundred in cloth, at twenty cents, and one hundred in half Turkey, at $1	180 00
	471 37

I mention these things not to intimate that there is any wrong intention on the part of the committee, but to show that all of us are liable to mistakes. And I wish to say here that I doubt not there have been mistakes and perhaps extravagance in some respects in the Government Printing Office. But though search has been made from New York to Washington as with a lighted candle in every place where it was possible to get proof, yet I assert that though there may have been mistakes, and though in some instances work might have been done cheaper, yet there has not been discovered one cent of fraud, one dollar used illegally by the Government Printer or any of his subordinates. The book-keeping in the Congressional Printing Office may be improved unquestionably; but it is the same system that came to the Congressional Printer when he entered the office; and I believe, as I said the other day, that he is an honest and honorable man.

Since I made my statement the other day, conscientiously and honestly, I have been threatened by an anonymous letter that I have got to be killed off. Well, it does not matter much to me about being killed off; I do not know exactly what it means. But I did not seek this place, and it will be no particular sacrifice for me to resign it. But while I stand here I will stand up for the rights of an American citizen when I believe he is treated unjustly; and I think the Congressional Printer in this secret examination, without the privilege of meeting his accusers face to face and of cross-questioning them, has been treated unjustly. I cannot do otherwise than express the thought of my heart that he is an honest man. And though there may be things to improve, as I doubt not there are, yet he is not to be condemned for fraud or intentional dishonesty in any respect whatever.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. In justice to the majority of the committee, after the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, I deem it proper to make a very brief statement in regard to one charge that is preferred, and that is that the Congressional Printer has not had an opportunity to meet the charges against him. The gentleman himself was present until called away from Washington by pressing business and he knows the truth of what I say. There was no matter affecting the Congressional Printer in regard to which he was left uninformed. Every time any point came up affecting his administration of the Government Office, no matter how trivial, he was placed in possession of the facts and asked to explain or bring forward testimony upon the point.

This was not a partisan or a political inquiry. It was merely a matter of business, and it was treated as a matter of business by the committee.

I hold in my hand here the testimony, and appeal to the gentlemen upon this floor to examine it. Look at the list of the witnesses called. First, there was the Congressional Printer. He said that he could not answer certain questions, and asked the committee to call men from his office to answer in reference to those matters. We did call them. And of the fifty witnesses or thereabouts that we called, about thirty, perhaps upward of thirty, were out of the Congressional Printing Office or were friends of his. The testimony shows this. We had no charges to make. We found a certain state of things existing. We asked the Congressional Printer to explain it. He was unable to explain it. The testimony shows he was utterly unable to explain it. This is clearly and distinctly shown.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word in regard to the administration of this office, although I do not desire to trespass on the time of the House. The first is to the gold-leaf which has been referred to. The testimony is very explicit that in using gold-leaf there is and must be a large waste. The testimony shows that the waste amounts to one-fourth of the gold-leaf purchased——

Mr. BALLOU. I wish to say, in answer to that, that the cost of the gold-leaf wasted is about 20 per cent. on the intrinsic value of the gold-leaf purchased, but the principal cost of the gold-leaf is in labor. But of the $50,000 of gold-leaf purchased there is not a loss of over $400.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I speak of the amount purchased; and the testimony bears me out in the statement that one-fourth of it comes back in waste; that there is a waste of one-fourth of the gold-leaf which is put on books broadcast and is then scraped off and becomes waste. Now, that waste when brought together, melted, and refined, is about 25 per cent. on every dollar's worth of gold-leaf that is used. That is the distinct testimony of the men who handle it.

One word more. The gentleman has referred to the making of private contracts. The old contract system was iniquitous. It worked wrong to the Government, as I said the other day. But what was the result after its abolition? We find that a greater waste is made by the Government Office than was made by private contracts. We find, too, that the expenditures have averaged $1,700,000 a year for the last seven years, and that there has been a net loss to the Government of not less than $500,000 a year. I am making no charges now of fraud or corruption. I simply state facts, and gentlemen can find them by an examination of the report.

Now, the gentleman from Rhode Island has referred to "slight" irregularities in the book-keeping of the Government Printing Office. What did we find during this investigation? Mr. Clapp, the Congressional Printer, was placed upon the stand first, that he might give the committee information in regard to the workings of the office and the book-keeping there. He did so as far as it was in his power, or professed to do so. We asked him all that we could think of in regard to it. Every point that occurred to the mind of any member of the committee was suggested to him, and finally we sent for the cash-books of the office. An examination of the cash-books revealed that large sums of money had not been entered upon these books at all. We found that documents had been sold to various parties, and the cash-books showed no entry of the transactions. From one firm alone the Congressional Printer has received upward of $1,000 since the close of this investigation for documents, which he had failed to enter. That was one item alone. I should call that a very serious, not a "slight," irregularity. We found in one column of the cash-books an error of $200, and that a forced balance was made, and no explanation whatever was given to the committee.

Again, when the cash books were brought to us it was stated that large sums of money from the sale of waste and documents of every kind, all of which should have been put in the Treasury, had not been entered in the books at all. It will be found from the reports of the Congressional Printer that for years past he states that so much had been realized from the sales of waste and documents and deposited in the Treasury. We were furnished a loose sheet of paper, and when traced to the legitimate conclusion it showed that the Congressional Printer had in his hands about $60,000 of money, not a dollar of which had been placed on the cash-books, and we have no explanation of the fact that is satisfactory to the committee, to the House, or to the country. If that is a "slight" irregularity, I have no idea what a bona fide genuine irregularity would be. It will be thus seen that these irregularities are enough to condemn the administration of the office.

The printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been referred to here. Special inquiry was made by the committee in regard to the RECORD. We found—and mark you, upon this point we examined employés of the Government Printer—that a great number of items and the cost thereof were omitted. For instance:

Blank-books for keeping the accounts, stationery, brooms, rollers, roller-composition, sirup, lye, ice, horse-feed, horse-shoeing, care of horses, repairs to machinery, blankets for presses, oil, benzine, fuel, steam-power, freight, hauling, gas in press and folding rooms, salary of clerk in charge of accounts—

This last item alone amounting to $1,200 a year—

binding of one hundred copies of four volumes each in sheep, and two hundred copies of four volumes each in calf, the cost of paper for the same, and the difference between the price of leather used and that charged, and other items.

This is but an imperfect list of the matters omitted from the statement reporting the cost of the RECORD, every one of which it was admitted by employés of the Congressional Printing Office should have been charged. The various items I have enumerated, and others not reported, aggregate not less than $12,000 for a short session of Congress. Now, I have omitted calculating the decrease by wear and tear of type, machinery, &c., which amounts to at least 10 per cent. of the investment. Taxes, insurance, and rent, of course, and probably other items have not been counted. The committee examined this matter thoroughly, and if gentlemen will examine the testimony and the history of the last few years they will find that we were right in our conclusions. Take a long and short session of Congress, combine the two, and you will find that as the proceedings and debates are now printed at the Government office they cost $50,000 more to the Government than if done by private contracts as proposed by the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON. In reply to what has been said by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BALLOU,] I wish to say a few words; and first, as to the charge that his friend, Mr. Clapp, has not had a fair chance before the committee. Now, sir, it will be remembered that the gentleman from Rhode Island himself is a member of that committee, and a very zealous and watchful friend of the interest of the Congressional Printer, and if the gentleman had reason to complain of the manner in which the investigation was conducted it should have been made then and there. But no word of complaint or objection ever escaped his lips that I now call to mind, and if the gentleman now rises and says that in the examination of witnesses the investigation was not conducted in fairness to Mr. Clapp, he is putting himself in a position where his negligence is not to be easily explained.

Mr. BALLOU. It is not fair under any circumstance that a man should be accused and not be able to meet his accusers; and this committee has not allowed Mr. Clapp, the Congressional Printer, to be present during the examination of witnesses. Now I am no lawyer and I am a novice in legislation, but I do feel that when a man is accused he should have the privilege of standing up before his accusers and cross-examining them.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the gentleman will take his seat and hear me through as I did him. I do not like to be interrupted at every step I take in answering his remarks. I now decline to yield further to interruptions. You will have an opportunity to respond to what I say. I state here that the Congressional Printer was never prevented from being present at the examination of witnesses, never refused the privilege of cross-examining them. I appeal now to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE,] to state whether the Congressional Printer was ever excluded from the committee-room, or prevented from examining a witness.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. He never was.

Mr. SINGLETON. I state again that he had the opportunity of coming to the committee-room at all times and of being heard, not only by himself, but, as the correspondence between himself and the committee will show, he had the privilege of bringing counsel with him.

Mr. BALLOU. That was at the close of the investigation.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will read the correspondence between Mr. Clapp and the chairman of the committee, in order that I may forever settle this question as to whether Mr. Clapp had the privilege of being present and examining witnesses or introducing such witnesses as he chose.

Mr. FOSTER. From what page is the gentleman reading?

Mr. SINGLETON. I read from pages 10 and 11 of the report of the Committee on Printing:

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, April 21, 1876.

DEAR SIR: As I have been assured by your committee that I shall have the privilege of reviewing the testimony taken in the printing investigation and of introducing rebutting testimony, and as I am not versed in the laws and rules of evidence, I desire the privilege of being attended by counsel. Will you please answer if that privilege will be granted?

Very respectfully,

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Now this letter contradicts directly what my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] says. Here is an acknowledgment of a fact which is true that he should have the privilege of reviewing and introducing rebutting testimony, &c. There is a little postscript to this letter which I will read, that I may not be charged with suppressing any part of it:

I have been suffering from sciatic rheumatism for nearly a week past, but hope to be able to get to the Capitol by Monday.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman House Committee on Printing.

The gentleman says that charges were preferred against the Congressional Printer. What charges were preferred and who preferred them? We were required by the order of this House to investigate the affairs of the Printing Office and the conduct of the Congressional Printer himself. There were no charges preferred against the Congressional Printer. We were simply looking into his conduct and the management of that office, as you would inquire into any other office or any other Department of the Government. There were no charges preferred against Mr. Clapp. The letter in reply to that of the Congressional Printer I will now read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Printing to inform you that they are ready to hear the testimony of such additional witnesses as you may desire to produce. I am further instructed to say that the committee have, at your request, already examined a number of witnesses from the Government Printing Office, but, desirous that no means be left untried to arrive at the truth regarding the cost of public printing, shall be pleased to hear the statement of others. It is necessary that the investigation be brought to a close, and you will therefore bring forward your witnesses during the latter part of the present week.

You are further informed that you can examine the testimony at any time after Thursday morning at ten o'clock, in the committee-room; and the committee desire me to add that you are at liberty to bring before them any reputable member of the legal profession as counsel.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

CHAS. J. WIENER,
Clerk of the Committee.

Hon. A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the fact that that letter was written after all the testimony had been taken with the exception of one witness. Then the committee proposed to give Mr. Clapp time in which to examine the testimony and introduce witnesses.

Mr. SINGLETON. It does not matter whether it was written before or after. He had full opportunity to be present at all times, and at his request the further privilege was granted of reviewing all the testimony and being represented by counsel in the examination of other witnesses by way of rebuttal.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to know if that is fair play?

Mr. SINGLETON. I so regard it.

Mr. FOSTER. You conduct a star-chamber investigation in secret and you give the man a single day to be heard.

Mr. SINGLETON. You are altogether mistaken about the star-chamber investigation.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. He was invited to be present at the examination of every witness.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not appear from the record.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I do not care whether it appears or not; that was the fact. He was there part of the time and was never denied the privilege of being there. An invitation was extended to him to be present.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to understand whether the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] undertakes to prove from this report that the committee gave the Congressional Printer a chance to be present when witnesses were examined.

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, as far as the report shows anything on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. I say that the record is to the exact contrary.

Mr. SINGLETON. And I say it is not.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no such proof in the record.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will again refer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to the letter just read in the hearing of the House, which constitutes a part of the record of the committee's proceedings. From the statement of the chairman, [Mr. VANCE, of Ohio,] corroborated by my own statement, and not denied by any one, it will be seen that whenever he chose to be present at the examination of any witness he was never excluded from the committee-room. He was there on many occasions, as is well known to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] as well as to the chairman and myself. When his clerks and foremen were examined, he was present at the examination of several of them, and I might say that he prompted them so far as he was allowed to do so. Not only that, but when he was first put on the stand we allowed him to send for his clerk to make explanations——

Mr. BALLOU. When the gentleman makes a charge——

Mr. SINGLETON. I will not submit to further interruption.

Mr. BALLOU. I ought to answer the charge——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SINGLETON. I say that when the Congressional Printer was first on the stand, not being able to explain his transactions, he was permitted to send for his clerk to aid him, and he had him there as a prompter and to put answers into his mouth which he could not make himself.

Now, sir, after all this courtesy on our part—after we have given him every opportunity to make his explanation, and examine witnesses, which he has declined as I will presently show by his letter—to charge that we have not given him a fair chance, is a reflection upon the committee which I think is not warranted and wholly unexpected on the part of my colleagues on the committee. I will now read the response made by Mr. Clapp to that letter of invitation:

OFFICE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER,
Washington, April 27, 1876.

SIR: I desire to acknowledge the receipt of the note of your clerk under date of the 24th instant. On consultation with counsel, I am advised that, inasmuch as I am an officer of the Senate of the United States, your committee has no jurisdiction to investigate my conduct in office as Congressional Printer, and that your committee will not pretend to do so.

So far as your inquiries under the resolution of the House of Representatives are concerned, I have no special interest, and therefore I have concluded that I have no duty to perform except to give you any information in my power in regard to the subject under investigation by your committee, which I have already done.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

A. M. CLAPP,
Congressional Printer.

Hon. JOHN L. VANCE,
Chairman of House Committee on Printing.

The members of this House and the country can judge whose fault it is that Mr. Clapp was not present and did not make his explanations. Here was the evidence all before him; he was permitted to examine the whole of it; he was invited to bring other witnesses there; because we wanted to arrive at the truth; we did not want to blacken the character of any man without giving him an opportunity to explain. Yet he throws himself upon his dignity and appealed to another forum where he might make his plea of justification of his conduct. He peremptorily refuses to come before this committee with his witnesses and attorney as he might have done, and vindicate, if possible, his good name and character from the damaging facts in testimony before said committee. The plain truth is, that there is no explanation to be given; he cannot contradict his own statements; he cannot contradict his own clerks and foremen, who were examined. The only chance for him to escape the penalty of the law seems to be in retreating behind the fact that he is an officer of the Senate; and that I do not believe will avail him. He was never precluded from examining witnesses. Besides that, I repeat, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] was there, and always put such questions to the witnesses as he thought would bring out proper explanations. We, as members of that committee, had no attorney to represent us. We had no feed counsel to prosecute him on the part of the Government. We were sitting there for the purpose of getting at the truth of this whole matter—not to furnish anything for our report except what was strictly true.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. You say you had no attorney before your committee.

Mr. SINGLETON. We had not.

Mr. FOSTER. Where was Rives?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. He was never in the committee-room during the examination of witnesses.

Mr. SINGLETON. I corroborate the statement of the chairman, [Mr. VANCE.] He was never present when witnesses were being examined.

Mr. FOSTER. He prompted probably almost every question put.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. He did not.

Mr. FOSTER. He induced the committee to report in favor of giving a contract to him for six years.

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, sir, the gentleman undertakes to state what he does not know, and what is not true in point of fact.

Mr. FOSTER. I know that the committee reported in favor of giving him the contract.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. The gentleman has made an assertion which is not the fact, and which there is not a scintilla of proof to sustain. I say distinctly that Mr. Rives was never present during the examination of any witness; he never came there except at the request of the committee to give information.

Mr. FOSTER. Has not the gentleman been in consultation with him?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. About this thing?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. Time and again?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Furthermore, I will say that I have been in consultation with Mr. Clapp——

Mr. FOSTER. That is all.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. No, I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is not all; I have been in consultation with Mr. Clapp time after time; with Mr. De Vinne, of New York, time after time; with more men than there are fingers on both my hands time after time, seeking for facts.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is not quite ingenuous for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to undertake to cast a reflection upon the committee because we have consulted with Mr. Rives in order to find out what we could in reference to the conduct of this officer.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman call it a reflection to intimate that the committee have been consulting with Mr. Rives?

Mr. SINGLETON. You seem to laugh as if you thought there was something in it.

Mr. FOSTER. O, no; not at all.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman seems to be very much amused and supposed from that fact that he thought he had made a point against the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand Mr. Rives to be a very respectable man.

Mr. SINGLETON. I cannot yield to the gentleman further. I wish to be courteous, but I must decline to submit to further interruption.

I wish to put this matter before the country in its proper light. I affirm again that what we have done has been done in no spirit of bitterness. We have given Mr. Clapp at all times and under all circumstances full opportunity to be heard before us by himself, his attorney, and his witnesses, and to cross-examine the witnesses that have been produced. We have offered him the opportunity to be present with or without counsel; yet he declines to appear and now comes into this House through his friends and declares that we have not dealt fairly with him. It is a mere subterfuge gotten up to hide him from public indignation, to create sympathy in his behalf, which, it is hoped, will cover up his enormities as a public functionary. The public will hold him accountable, whatever may be done here.

I am perfectly willing the whole testimony shall go before the country that it may determine whether we have conducted this examination in that spirit which should animate honest and straightforward men.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one other thing to which I wish to refer. The gentleman from Rhode Island to-day, as on a former occasion, vaunts the honesty and integrity of the Congressional Printer. I dislike to say anything on that subject, preferring to let the testimony determine the question whether he is honest or not, but when the gentleman declares and reiterates the fact that he is honest and his skirts are clear, I feel I must call the attention of the House to a few of the statements and facts contained in the testimony.

You will find that Mr. Clapp came before the Committee on Printing, and, when interrogated as to whether he had deposits in any bank in this city, his response was that he had not. But I will turn to the testimony itself, lest you might suppose I have not quoted him correctly. I will let his own statements speak, together with answers given by others, to show whether he is honest and truthful or not. I read from page 82 of the testimony taken in this case and accompanying the report of the Committee on Printing.

The Congressional Printer, being under oath, answered as follows:

Question. Have you no deposit in any bank in the city?
Answer. No, sir.

Such is the response which he makes to a question propounded to him by the Committee on Printing.

A few days afterward the cashier of the Metropolis Savings Bank in this city, J. A. Ruff, testified before the committee, and answered in this wise:

Question. What amount of money has he on deposit in your bank?

That question refers to the Congressional Printer, Mr. A. M. Clapp. Mr. Ruff's answer was:

Answer. I think about $12,000. On March 11, A. M. Clapp deposited $12,641 05 and on the same day he made a check for $300. On March 29 he made a check for $46.81.

Leaving about $12,300. How does this tally with his statement that he had no deposit in any bank in the city? Now let the gentleman reconcile these statements if he can, and then boast of the honesty and integrity of the Congressional Printer.

Again, we introduced Mr. H. C. Swaine, cashier of the Second National Bank, as a witness, who also bears testimony to the falsity of the statement that Clapp had no bank deposits. Here are the questions and answers:

Question. After examination of the books, what amount at any one time or at various times did Mr. Clapp have on deposit before you become cashier?
Answer. Not exceeding $15,000 or $16,000 at any one time.

* * * * * * *

Q. What amount has he now on deposit?
A. Not exceeding $1,800.

We next examined George H. B. White, cashier of the National Metropolitan Bank of this city.

Question. What amount of money has Mr. Clapp had on deposit at your bank?
Answer. I cannot say that I have examined carefully into that, but as high as $10,000, or more possibly, at a time; not many times. I think, probably, hardly at any time more than $10,000, and not that I know of more than on one occasion.

To the question whether he had any deposits he answered unequivocally that he had none. Mr. Ruff, cashier of the Metropolis Savings Bank, and Mr. Swaine, cashier of the Second National Bank, testified before the committee as stated above, fully contradicting him.

Mr. BALLOU. Is there any evidence that was Government money?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not yield for further interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Rhode Island is not in order.

Mr. BALLOU. I merely wish to state that there is no evidence these deposits were Government money.

Mr. SINGLETON. The question, it will be observed, did not make any reference to Government money, but was general in character.

I cannot submit to further interruptions.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to another gross misstatement, to use no stronger term, which was made by the Congressional Printer. I refer to page 85 of the testimony:

By Mr. SINGLETON:

Question. Please state the amount of money you now have on deposit in your safe belonging to the Government, accumulating from the sale of documents, waste, &c.
Answer. Somewhere in the vicinity of $50,000.

Now, sir, I turn to page 108. The question was asked Mr. Clapp:

Will you permit the clerk of this committee, Mr. Wiener, to go to your office and in your presence count the money?
Answer. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wiener did accompany him. They went to the office together, as Mr. Wiener testified. And what does Mr. Wiener, the clerk of the committee, say, after he had gone and counted the money? He says:

I counted the sum in the safe and found that it amounted to $16,257.99.

Mr. Clapp had sworn in the committee-room not many minutes before this examination took place that there was in his safe at that moment a sum in the neighborhood of $50,000 belonging to the Government; and the clerk of the committee leaves the room with him, goes with him to the office and counts the money, and there finds $16,257.90.

Mr. BALLOU. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; I have been interrupted enough. Such is the evidence of the honesty of this friend of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

I will not characterize the offense of which he has been guilty. Other officials of the country must look into that, and determine whether he is not indictable for a grave offense under the criminal law of the land. But again this honest official, of whom the gentleman talks, has kept in his possession, as he states himself, for about five years large sums of money that belonged to the Government, amounting, as the testimony of his own clerk, Mr. Larcombe, shows, to $50,000, but which under an examination made by an expert, Mr. Behle, amounts to upwards of $60,000. And yet there is not one scratch of a pen in any book in his office which shows that there is one single dollar in his hands belonging to the Government. The books of the office have been balanced from year to year. The amounts of money they profess to have received and profess to have paid over are there balanced—and any gentleman can examine them—and there is not a trace on those books of this large amount of money that belongs to the Government of the United States. Such is another evidence of the honesty of the Congressional Printer.

Let me refer to another matter. In regard to this question of gold-leaf it is in proof here—and I ask that members of this House will examine the proof—that the amount of gold-leaf bought by the office during the last seven years there should be no less than $14,000 of waste which belongs to the Government; and yet, when we came to examine into it, we found there was less than four hundred dollars' worth of that waste of gold-leaf. We sent it over and had it refined at Baltimore in the presence of Mr. Roberts and Mr. Wiener, and it turned out less than $400, there being a loss to the Government of almost $14,000 by the neglect, or whatever you choose to characterize it, of this Congressional Printer. Here is additional evidence of the honesty of that gentleman.

I need not read from the testimony in regard to these points. What I have said in reference to them will not be controverted. What I have said in regard to the amount of money in the hands of the Congressional Printer he does not deny, and it is proved by his own bookkeeper and by Mr. Behle, the expert who examined the matter. It is settled beyond any controversy.

I might follow up these charges against the Congressional Printer and show that in other respects he has been grossly delinquent; that he has received money—the receipts for which accompany the testimony reported—from divers individuals and given his receipts for it which are before this House as exhibits, and yet there is not a particle of evidence on his books showing that that money came into his hands. Do you call this honesty? Will you now vaunt your friend as an honest man in the face of the world with all these facts staring you in the face? If they prove anything they prove just the reverse of what the gentleman from Rhode Island has stated to-day. They prove that there is no honesty, no soundness, no integrity in the Congressional Printer.

If the Congressional Printer and his friends are anxious to have further examination into his acts and doings, ample time will be afforded. If he can explain away what he has said himself, or can contradict any of the evidence against him by his book-keepers, clerks, and foremen, let him do it and produce his evidence before this House, and perhaps its decision will be reversed. But I venture the assertion to-day that he cannot get out of these charges unless he is able to shield himself behind the fact that he is an officer of the Senate and not responsible for his acts to this body. But I do not wish to prosecute this matter any further. What I have done has not been done in an improper spirit. I wish it to be distinctly understood that this was no pleasant task to me. I have not been the prosecutor of any criminal for years. I have been a practitioner of law, and have declined to take fees for prosecutions because contrary to my feelings and my heart. I have been defending law-breakers all my life. But here I had no discretion. I had not the privilege of selecting my client. And when a duty is put on me I will discharge that duty in the face of the country, to the best of my ability, even though I should get letters such as the gentleman from Rhode Island spoke of, threatening my life. Let me say that the matter of these letters is too frivolous to be paraded here, too ridiculous to bring to the attention of the House. I have no hesitation in saying, in view of my knowledge of men, if the gentleman has received those letters they have been prompted by A. M. Clapp and his friends, that capital might be made out of these facts. I think the chairman of this committee, [Mr. VANCE,] who has been diligently following this matter up, will bear testimony that his House has been watched time after time to see who went in there to communicate information. And we know that the men holding office under the Congressional Printer are afraid to come before the committee and give evidence, knowing that if they do they will be turned out of their positions. And they have declined to do so because they knew it would be their death-warrant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire a few moments.

Mr. SINGLETON. I had no desire to debate this question, but was forced to do so by remarks made by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BALLOU.] I do not wish to have it debated further at this stage of the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a few words at this stage of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi insist upon the previous question?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not sustain the demand.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not wish to be discourteous, and I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the hour up?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not; ten minutes remain.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire only to make two or three points on the merits of the proposition, not on the question of what has been done fairly or unfairly about the matter of investigation, although it does appear to me that that sense of Anglo-Saxon fair play which I believe every white man has inherited with his blood—I mean which every Anglo-Saxon inherits from his race—that when a man is accused of anything, and especially of criminal acts, he ought to have a chance to meet his accusers face to face and be permitted to cross-examine them——

Mr. WILLIS. Why do you not include the colored brethren? They are equally entitled to fair play.

Mr. GARFIELD. That right, as I understand, was not given to the Congressional Printer in this investigation; but no matter. I pass all that by to call the attention of the House to the thing which it is now proposed to do, namely, to abolish our present method of printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; to take it out of the hands of the Government Printing Office and turn it over to the system of contract. Is that a wise thing to do? If we refer this matter to the Committee on Appropriations we provide that they shall do this thing; it is a recommendation to them to do it. Now, I say that the largest share of the experience of the Government in reference to this matter has been in the way of contract printing, and the largest share of scandal that has ever come out of any Government work in proportion to the amount has been in regard to the printing. No political scandals connected with any one of the smaller expenditures of the Government have ever equaled the scandals which have arisen from this business of public printing. If we have the work done by the Government we will have the business in our hands and under the direct supervision of our committee and inspectors as to the honesty and fairness of the work; but, under the contract system, when we have once made a contract and turned it over to the contractor, it is almost impossible in the very nature of the case that any amount of rascality shall not happen.

Now, I am not saying a word against the party to whom it is proposed to give this contract, but I want to refer to a fact or two. For example, in the years just preceding the war this business of Government printing was done by contract, and I hold in my hand a volume nearly one-half of which is taken up with the report of the dreadful abuses of printing at that time. There was a printer to the House and a printer to the Senate, and by a sublease they gave the work to a third party, and a large sum of money paid was a bonus to that third party. He actually let out the printing to a political editor at 43 per cent., not on the net profits but on the gross receipts. It was a clear, naked gift to a political party for political purposes. It was sworn to and so testified to that 43 per cent. of the gross profits were a political contribution to a political party.

Now, there is another thing that can happen under the contract system to which I wish to call attention. When the printer was paid so much per thousand ems on one occasion a new font of type was procured, what is known as broad-shouldered type. It takes only two-thirds as many to fill a line as the original type, because under the old rule the counting was so much per type; and the Government had to pay one-third more for composing in consequence of the increased space occupied by the broad-shouldered type, which was an increase of 33⅓ per cent.; and this was just by the trickiness of certain firms in using certain forms of type; the letters were the same at the time, were broad-shouldered, and occupied more space; and all the tricks of the trade were resorted to. If we recur to the contract system all these old evils will return; and we are called upon now, after three years' experiment of doing the work ourselves, to abandon the experiment and go back to the worst policy in reference to this public printing that we have ever known.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. That does not refer to the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not now talking of the printing of the RECORD.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. The gentleman can say nothing in regard to the contract system but what will meet my approval, but at the same time the entire cost of printing during the years to which he refers will not cover the excess of charges now in one year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course my colleague if he had been here for three or four years would have known that I have been laboring in season and out season in the Committee on Appropriations to cut down the cost of the public printing. The trouble is not in the rate of printing, but in the enormous demands for printing that the two Houses of Congress make.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. That is not the trouble.

Mr. GARFIELD. Two years ago the Committee on Appropriations brought in a clause in a bill relating to the public printing, providing that the rate in our printing office should not be more than 5 per cent. in excess of the rates paid in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, which is fixed by the printers' typographical union. We carried it through tellers, but were beaten on the yeas and nays. Why? Because the printers' union controlled by their rules the price of labor; and when a member of the Union in some other place comes here he is compelled to obey the rules of the printers' union here.

Now it so happens that a majority of the printers employed in the Government Office belong to the printers' union, and the wages they demand are 50 per cent. higher than they are in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York. The Committee on Appropriations, the time to which I have referred, was overruled because an election was pending and gentlemen did not like to oppose the printers' union. I was confronted here by that printers' union. I was told that that printers' union had marked me for slaughter at home politically, and that if it was necessary to raise money to beat me it should be done by the printers' union. They tried it and failed, and we have been paying about 40 per cent. more here than is paid in other cities. If you want reform, here is the place to make it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. The Government office is paying more for labor now than outside offices in the city of Washington.

Mr. SINGLETON. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Printing; and on a division there were—ayes 107, noes 74.

So the report was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made a special order immediately after the disposal of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SEELYE. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

TRANSFER OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to call up the naval appropriation bill, but before doing so I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I ask consent to introduce for action at this time a bill making certain transfers of appropriations in the provisions for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice for the current year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice in the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, be amended by transferring to the appropriation for miscellaneous expenditures the following sums from their specific appropriations, to wit:

Three hundred dollars from the appropriation for furniture and repairs;

Three hundred dollars from the appropriation for care and subsistence of horses; and

Two hundred dollars from the appropriation for repairs of carriages and harness, making the amount so transferred $800.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill has been examined by the Committee on Appropriations, and is believed to be correct.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3479) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2286) to further provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, court-rooms, &c., in the city of Memphis, Tennessee;

An act (H. R. No. 2452) to extend the time to pre-emptors on public lands; and

An act (H. R. No. 3136) extending the time within which homestead entries upon certain lands in Michigan may be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. I desire to call up the special order, being House joint resolution No. 14, authorizing the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce with Canada can be arranged.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] if he proposes to call up the naval appropriation bill, in accordance with the understanding which has been had. Some of us have been waiting for days for that bill to be reached.

Mr. BLOUNT. I propose to call up that bill in one hour and a half from this time.

Mr. HALE. This is the first intimation I have had that it was not to be brought up directly after the printing matter was disposed of.

Mr. BLOUNT. Perhaps I should state to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] what was the understanding.

Mr. HALE. I have been in conference with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] about the matter within ten minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I will say that I do not intend to do anything that is unfair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the understanding that the naval appropriation bill will come up in one hour and a half from this time.

Mr. HALE. Supposing the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yields the floor now, how does this matter of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] come up?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the gentleman is about to call it up.

Mr. HALE. Can the question of consideration be raised?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman chooses to raise that question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not raise it myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is always in order.

Mr. WARD. I hope I may be allowed to proceed, and not have the time consumed in this way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] raise the question of consideration between the naval appropriation bill and the subject which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] proposes to call up?

Mr. HALE. I do not desire to yield any rights that I may have. Let me understand what the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] proposes. I am opposed to the joint resolution which the gentleman ftom New York has referred to, as are other gentlemen. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has made an arrangement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] shall now make his speech upon that subject, and that then the subject shall drop, so that it will stand as it does now, I will have no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the understanding.

Mr. HALE. Not that it shall be considered as unfinished business?

Mr. WARD. It will stand as a special order, following the appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. There is to be nothing now more than the gentleman's speech?

Mr. WARD. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] the naval appropriation bill will come up.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia to ask that the House now make an order for a recess from half past four this afternoon to half past seven, the session of this evening to be for general debate on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I intended to do that after the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE. You had better do it now.

Mr. BLOUNT. At the suggestion of several gentlemen I will ask that the House now order that a recess be taken from half past four to half past seven.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire to bring to the attention of the House a joint resolution in reference to the acceptance of a statue of Ethan Allen. I have been waiting for several days for that purpose, but other business has intervened. I ask that, if an evening session be ordered, before the House goes into Committee of the Whole this evening upon the naval appropriation bill, I may be allowed to present that resolution for the action of the House and to submit some remarks upon the subject; also, that my colleagues may have an opportunity to submit some remarks.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] proposes that if a recess be taken he shall have the opportunity to call up this evening the subject of the Ethan Allen statue.

Mr. O'NEILL. I suggest that we take a recess from five o'clock to eight o'clock, instead of from half past four o'clock till half past seven.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it the understanding that no business is to be done this evening?

Mr. BLOUNT. I said for general debate only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state the arrangement, so that there may be no conflict this afternoon or this evening.

Mr. HALE. I wish to qualify a remark I made a moment ago in regard to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] He and I had been talking about this matter, but it was not so lately as I supposed, and afterward he may have had conference with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] and was undoubtedly doing what he thought was fair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the arrangement to be that at the end of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] the naval appropriation bill shall come up; that a recess be taken from five o'clock till eight o'clock, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL]——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to ask a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will allow the Chair to state the proposition. When the House meets at eight o'clock the joint resolution in regard to the statue of Ethan Allen will come up; and when that is disposed of, the naval appropriation bill will be taken up for general debate only. Is there objection to this arrangement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood that half past seven was to be the hour of meeting this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was modified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not accept the modification.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to know whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is now to speak upon a bill fixed for this day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He is.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Then allow me to ask what becomes of the special orders fixed for consideration on days previous to this, and which were not considered on those days? What becomes of those bills? Are they lost?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are not lost.

Mr. RANDALL. Not if they were made orders to continue from day to day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are continuing orders from day to day. The gentleman from Kentucky has the right to raise the question of consideration between those special orders and the business of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Then I desire to ask whether a bill fixed for to-day takes priority of bills fixed for previous days?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that special orders take priority in the order of the time for which they were fixed.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would like to have this question understood.

Mr. WARD. I think I must call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky that there is now being prepared by the proper clerk of the House a list in chronological order of the various special orders; so that to-morrow, when that list is expected to be ready, we shall be able to see exactly what special orders there are and the relation in which they stand to each other.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Then I desire to put a question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already directed the Clerk to make out such a list. It is being made at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. That does not answer my question. I desire to know (and I presume it is a parliamentary question) whether bills which have been fixed for certain days and which were not reached on those days must be fixed for other days; or will they come up in order without fixing anew a time for their consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If they are continuing orders, it is not necessary to fix another day for their consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I am speaking of bills fixed to be considered from day to day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order in which the gentleman is interested is a continuing order from day to day.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I had an apprehension that bills fixed as subsequent special orders were being allowed priority.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] begins his remarks, I want it understood at what time the House is to convene this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] insists on the proposition for a recess from half past four until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. I merely made a suggestion; I did not offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be understood, then, that the recess shall be from half past four until half past seven.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2018) to authorize the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to improve certain real estate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 677) granting a site for an observatory to the trustees of the Lick Observatory of the astronomical department of the University of California.

RECIPROCITY.

The House, according to order, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutually beneficial treaty of commerce with Canada can be arranged.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, at the present time, when capital seeks investment, interest is reduced beyond all precedent in this country, wages are lowered, immigration decreases, the value of our exports is diminished, and hundreds of thousands of our people are in search of work by which they may earn a livelihood, it is the duty of wise statesmen and sound patriots to do the utmost in their power to promote the return of prosperity by such measures as will best extend the sales of our productions and promote our carrying trade and commerce. Hitherto, intent upon the development of our unparalleled resources, and having a sparse population, we have paid too little attention to external trade and the encouragement of foreign markets for our products, especially for those of our manufactories, the number of which we have stimulated to an extent far greater than is commensurate with the demands of our own population.

There is no more obvious remedy for this state of affairs at present, nor any more sure and stable foundation of our prosperity in all time to come, than the extension of our commercial relations with the adjacent countries on this continent—on the north with Canada, and on the south with Mexico.

EXTENT AND RESOURCES OF CANADA.

We yet seldom appreciate at their great and practical value the importance of the vast regions north of the United States on this continent. Stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, they contain an area of at least 3,478,380 square miles; more than is owned by the United States, exclusive of our newly acquired territory in the far northwest, and not much less than the whole of Europe with its family of nations. No small proportion of these Territories consists of barren and inhospitable regions in the extreme north; but, as a recompense, the arid plains extending through Texas, and thence northward beyond the limits of the United States, are comparatively insignificant as they enter the British possessions, where the Rocky Mountains, being less elevated and having a narrower base, admit the passage of the clouds from the Pacific Ocean, bearing ample rain with its fertilizing influences into the interior of the continent. By the same cause the climate is tempered.

The isothermal line of 60° for summer rises on the northwestern plains as high as the sixty-first parallel, its average position in Europe; and a favorable comparison may also be traced for winter and the other seasons of the year. Spring opens almost simultaneously for a distance of about twelve hundred miles on the vast plains reaching northerly from Saint Paul. Along the valleys of the Red, Assinaboine, Saskatchewan, and Mackenzie Rivers, for more than seven hundred miles north of the limit of the United States, wheat has been grown, yielding most abundant returns, thus indicating a soil and climate well suited for the crops ordinarily produced in the cooler parts of the temperate zone. Barley, the grasses, and many root crops grow twelve hundred miles north of the same boundary.

These facts are significant proofs of the immense capabilities of the agricultural areas in the interior of the continent north of the forty-ninth parallel. Westward from these regions—yet scarcely inhabited, but of incalculable value in the future—are countries of yet milder climate on the Pacific coast, whose relations to California are already important. On the eastward are the rapidly increasing settlements, enjoying the rich lands and pleasant climate of Manitoba, on the Red River of the North, a stream capable of steamboat navigation for four hundred miles.

It is asserted by those who add personal knowledge of the subject to scientific investigation, that the habitable but undeveloped area of the British possessions westerly from Lake Superior and Hudson's Bay comprises sufficient territory to make twenty-five States equal in size to Illinois. Bold as this assertion is, it meets with confirmation in the isothermal charts of Blodgett, the testimony of Richardson, Simpson, Mackenzie, the maps published by the government of Canada, and recent explorations.

North of a line drawn from the northern limit of Lake Superior to the coast at the southern limit of Labrador exists a vast region, possessing in its best parts a climate barely endurable, and reaching into the arctic regions. This country, even more cold, desolate, and barren on the Atlantic coast than in the interior latitudes, becoming early known to travelers, has given character in public estimation to the whole north.

Another line, drawn from the northern limit of Minnesota to that of Maine, includes nearly all the inhabited portion of Canada, a country extending opposite the Territory of Dakota and States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine, possessing a climate identical with that of our Northern States.

THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

The "maritime provinces" on the Atlantic coast include New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland. Geographically they may be regarded as a northeasterly prolongation of the New England system. Unitedly they include an area of at least 86,000 square miles, and are capable of supporting a larger population than that at present existing in the United States or Great Britain. They are equal in extent to the united territory of Holland, Greece, Belgium, Portugal, and Switzerland.

The natural interests of New Brunswick and the adjacent State of Maine are inseparably connected. New Brunswick has an area of 22,000,000 acres and a sea-coast four hundred miles in extent and abounding in harbors. It had at the census of 1871 a population of 285,594, being nearly equal to that of Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, and Colorado. The chief occupations of its inhabitants are connected with ship-building, the fisheries, and the timber trade. Judging from authentic surveys and records, it is scarcely possible to speak too highly of its climate, soil, and capabilities. Few countries are so well watered and wooded. On its unreclaimed surface are large stocks of timber; beneath are coal-fields. The rivers, lakes, and sea-coast abound with fish.

Nova Scotia, a long peninsula, united to the American continent by an isthmus only fifteen miles wide, is two hundred and eighty miles in length. The numerous indentations on its coast form harbors unsurpassed in any part of the world. Including Cape Breton, it has an area of 12,000,000 acres. Wheat and the usual cereals and fruits of the Northern States flourish in many parts of it. Its population in 1871 was declared by the census to be 387,800. Besides possessing productive fisheries and agricultural resources, it is rich in mineral wealth, having beneath its surface coal, iron, manganese, gypsum, and gold.

The province of Prince Edward Island is separated from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia by straits only nine miles in width. It is crescent-shaped, one hundred and thirty miles in length, and at its broadest part is thirty-four miles wide. It is a level region, of a more moderate temperature than that of Lower Canada, and well adapted to agricultural purposes.

The island of Newfoundland has a sea-coast of one thousand miles in extent. It has an area of 23,040,000 acres, of which only a small portion is cultivated. Its spring is late, its summer short, but the frost of winter is less severe than in many parts of our own northern States and Territories. It is only sixteen hundred and sixty-five miles distant from Ireland. It possesses a large trade with various countries, including Spain, Portugal, Italy, the West Indies, and the Brazils.

The chief wealth of Newfoundland and of the Labrador coast is to be found in their extensive and inexhaustible fisheries, in which the other provinces also partake. The future products of these, when properly developed by human ingenuity and industry, defy calculation. The Gulf Stream is met near the shores of Newfoundland by a current from the polar basin, vast deposits are formed by the meeting of the opposing waters, the great submarine islands known as "The Banks" are formed, and the rich pastures created in Ireland by the warm and humid influences of the Gulf Stream are compensated by the "rich sea-pastures of Newfoundland." The fishes of warm or tropical waters, inferior in quality and scarcely capable of preservation, cannot form an article of commerce like those produced in inexhaustible quantities in these cold and shallow seas. The abundance of these marine resources is unequaled in any other portion of the globe, except where similar conditions exist in the northern Pacific ocean.

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec, known as Canada, before the union with the Dominion, include an area of not less than 185,115,607 acres, independently of the northwestern regions yet scarcely open for settlement. Their territory is three times as large as that of Great Britain and Ireland, and more than three times that of Prussia. It intervenes between the great northwest and the maritime provinces, and consists chiefly of a vast projection into the territory of the United States, although it possesses a coast of nearly one thousand miles on the river and gulf of the Saint Lawrence, where fisheries of cod, herring, mackerel, and salmon are carried on successfully. Valuable fisheries exist also in its lakes. It is rich in metallic ore and in the resources of its forests. Large portions of it are peculiarly favorable to the growth of wheat, barley, and the other cereals of the North.

Within thirty-five years, or less than the life-time of nearly all who are now hearing me, the population of Ontario and Quebec has increased about fivefold, or from 582,000 to 2,812,367.

THE PEOPLE OF CANADA.

The population of the Dominion of Canada and the other possessions now exceeds four millions, being more than that of Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, and New Hampshire, added together, at the last census. Many of their inhabitants are of French extraction, and a few German settlements exist; but two-thirds of the people of the provinces owe their origin either to the United States or to the British islands, whose language we speak, and who "people the world with men industrious and free." The identity of language in contiguous countries is a fair exponent of the tendency to amalgamation. It generally implies great similarity, if not identity, of religion, laws, and habits, the essential elements of thorough fusion.

NATURAL COMMERCIAL RELATION.

Apart from the artificial regulations by customs-duties, the exchanges of the products of labor between the people of the United States and their neighbors on the north would be as intimate and, in proportion to the population, at least as various and comprehensive, as those of the States of our Union with each other. In fact the commercial relations of our northern, northwestern, and eastern States with the Dominion of Canada, if left simply and without obstruction to the practical test of benefits or profits given and received by the people of both countries, would be more close and intimate than those between most parts of the Union. The great lakes, which for some thousands of miles politically separate us, are themselves among the cheapest and most useful means of intercommunication for the northwestern and eastern States, and, with the majestic river through which their waters flow, have long furnished, by aid of short canals, one of the most important channels of trade and travel from the interior to the ocean, and thence to the chief markets of the world.

Nearly three-fourths of the people of the Dominion inhabit a territory in latitudes south of our boundaries in Maine and Minnesota. Across this region, and especially the peninsula between Lakes Huron and Michigan, is the direct line of communication between the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York on the one side, and Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and all our Territories west of them on the other.

IMPORTANCE OF FREE EXCHANGES WITH CANADA TO ALL PARTS OF THE UNION.

Great as the value of transit through Canada is to our people, similar freedom through our territory is perhaps even more important to the Canadians. Excepting the maritime provinces, the whole of the British North American possessions until they approach the Pacific Ocean is dependent upon the railroads, canals, rivers, and other means of communication in the United States for the shortest routes to the ocean. Fortunately, what is in this respect almost the necessity of the Canadians is one from which must result the employment of our people and profit to our forwarders on such a scale that it will confer conspicuous national benefit upon us if we do not prevent the natural interests of the people from attaining due and harmonious development. More than that, the great natural, permanent system of exchanges is between the North and South; their productions being necessarily distinct, and modern civilization having rendered them practically necessaries of life to the people of each region.

Regarding the subject from a broad and national point of view, it is instructive to see how great and varied are the advantages that would result to all parts of our country from free intercourse with the neighboring nations. The northern and southern parts of our continent possess special and distinct advantages for producing commodities with which each can purchase those of other sections. The Northern States, for instance, need fear no competition with Mexico or Cuba in manufactures or agriculture. These countries would purchase, in increased quantities, our manufactures, cereals, meats, and fish, while we in return should consume more of their sugar, coffee, fruits, and other tropical productions. The agricultural productions of Canada are almost identical with those of the Northern States, but would be exchanged for our own manufactures, and for the products of warmre climates, in part those of our Southern States and in part of regions yet farther south, whose products would thus be brought through our territory, and afford employment and profit to our people, with advantages to all the countries which would be parties to the arrangement. Our agriculture, manufactures, and carrying trade would alike be benefited, and the natural operation of the laws of trade would necessarily confer corresponding benefits on those for whom our work would be done and with whom our exchanges would be made.

The trade between the northern and southern parts of this continent must attain enormous proportions. It is very desirable for our people that it should as soon as possible be developed to the utmost. Its natural course will be through the central or intermediate States, creating in them commercial interests of a magnitude which it is almost impossible now to calculate. The mutual benefits thus given and received would be perpetually diffused and circulate in every vein and artery of commerce and manufactures throughout the Union and be accompanied with the gratifying knowledge that they were derived from the prosperity of our neighbors in other countries.

RECIPROCITY APPROVED BY LEADING STATESMEN OF BOTH PARTIES.

As the naturally interdependent commercial relations of the United States and Canada arise from geographical and climatic causes which are permanent and unchangeable, and the cost of labor and the interest on capital in both countries are, reckoning from a series of years, nearly alike, they have from the beginning of our history attracted the attention of our leading statesmen without distinction of party.

During the Presidency of General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, when writing in 1829 to Mr. McLane, then our minister at the court of St. James, referring especially to the North American colonies, said:

> The policy of the United States in relation to their commercial intercourse with other nations is founded on principles of perfect equality and reciprocity. By the adoption of these principles they have endeavored to relieve themselves from the discussions, discontents, and embarrassments inseparable from the imposition of burdensome discriminations. These principles were avowed while they were yet struggling for their independence, are recorded in their first treaty, and have been adhered to with the most scrupulous fidelity.

The exceptional character of our natural commercial relations with Canada has also been duly observed by some of the most eminent advocates of what is termed a "protective" policy. One of the chief arguments in its favor is that against admitting the products of "pauper labor" to compete with those of our own citizens. It has no force in reference to a contiguous country, from which people can pass to the United States in a few moments or at most a few hours. The other argument of the same class of theorists is derived from the importance of a "home market." But a "home market" is the market nearest home, and this is furnished by the respective countries to each other at every point of their coterminous territory.

Mr. Clay, who was called the father of the "protective" system, duly appreciated these facts, and from his stand-point added valuable testimony to the uniformity of opinion among American statesmen in his time, and his conviction as to the policy by which he desired our country to be guided.

The Government of the United States—> has always been anxious that the trade between them and the British colonies should be placed on a liberal and equitable basis. There has not been a moment since the adoption of the present Constitution when they have not been willing to apply to it principles of fair reciprocity and equal competition.

He said—

As time has passed and the country on both sides of the frontier has become more closely inhabited, farms, villages, and cities taking the place of the primeval wilderness, the value of the intercourse of the people has immensely increased. When Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren deemed it important the population of Canada was insignificant. It is now larger than that of all the six New England States added together.

The interests involved and the benefits each country can confer upon itself by due emancipation of its industry are so many and obvious that they will continually demand discussion until they are fully settled on the basis of perfect freedom and our trade with Canada is as unrestricted as that of our different States among themselves. It is our duty to regard these questions practically, avoiding alike on one side the inconsiderate haste which might result from political sentimentality, and on the other the influence of the absurd and pernicious dogma which carried to its logical results would put an end to all trade, individual as well as national, that whatever is profitable to others must be injurious to ourselves.

THE MAGNITUDE OF CANADIAN TRADE.

The modern increase of facilities of communication by canals, railroads, bridges, steamboats, telegraphs, and the press, assisting the transfer of merchandise, the travel of passengers, and the free interchange of thought between the United States and the Dominion, add to the policy enunciated by Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren a value we cannot estimate too highly. The commercial spirit and resolute enterprise of the Canadians is shown no less by the attractions they have presented to immigration and the consequent increase of their population than by the fact that with a population small in comparison with that of many nations in the Old World they already rank as the fourth power on the globe in the extent of their merchant shipping, taking precedence in its extent and quality of all countries except Great Britain, the United States, and Germany.

The aggregate of the foreign trade of Canada in 1872–'73 and 1873–'74 was about two hundred and seventeen millions, each year, being considerably more than one-sixth of all the imports and domestic and foreign exports of the United States. The aggregate of our foreign trade in 1875 was $1,219,434,544. If it had been as large as that of Canada in proportion to the population of the two countries, it would have exceeded $2,400,000,000.

OUR TRADE WITH CANADA.

Notwithstanding the adverse laws in both countries, preventing a free exchange of the products of the industry of their people, thus depriving Canada of her natural prosperity, injuring the business of many of our States, and most seriously impeding the progress of those parts of our country which are near the Canadian frontier, our exports of articles the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States to Canada, according to the report of the Treasury Department, amounted in 1873–'74 to no less than $42,505,914, being more than twenty times as large as those to China, whence we draw so large a proportion of our imports, and larger than our exports of a similar character to any country in the world excepting only Great Britain, Germany, and France. Our exports to Canada of goods of foreign origin in the same year amounted to $4,589,343, and the total trade with her to at least the vast sum of $85,253,168.

Taking the official statistics of Canada as the test of our exports to the Dominion, the value of our exports was much larger, those entered for consumption there having amounted to $54,279,749, and our imports to $35,061,117—the aggregate trade having been $90,524,000.

In 1874-'75 the aggregate of our domestic exports to Canada, as shown in the Report on Commerce and Navigation, including the additions on page 416, was $49,906,285, and the trade between the two countries amounted altogether to $86,256,925.

An examination of our exports to Canada shows that her value as an outlet for our manufactures has long been much underrated. This has, no doubt, arisen in part from the fact that we compute the amount of our exports from our own custom-house statistics. These are the best sources we have of information as to our imports, on which accuracy is exacted because they are subject to duty; but there is no such urgency as to our exports. They pass from our side of the lines without much attention from our officers. Modern political economists and statisticians have observed the operation of the same rule in various countries, and regard it as an established axiom that "the amount of export is always less exactly registered than the amount of import because with the former duty is but rarely levied." This rule applies with peculiar force to the ordinary data furnished by the official reports of the commerce and navigation of the United States so far as they refer to Canada.

In 1874 the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics asked the attention of the national Legislature to this subject and repeated his request in 1875. He found it impracticable, if not impossible, to obtain full returns of merchandise exported to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Our custom-house returns on the Canadian border are necessarily defective, in part for want of legislation requiring persons exporting merchandise by railway-cars or other land-vehicles, which have long been used in the transportation of merchandise across the Canadian borders to file full manifests of such merchandise with the collector of the customs as is required in the case of all exports to foreign countries in vessels. It has been found on close investigation into the facts that in both countries the accounts of imports from each into the other are the more accurate, because "the customs-officers of both are constantly on the alert to see that no dutiable merchandise crosses the border without paying its prescribed impost."

Upon the basis thus irrefutably laid down, it is found that the value of articles of domestic production exported from the United States to Canada in 1874 was $11,424,566, and in 1875 no less than $15,660,281, in addition to the amounts shown by our own official records. This enormous amount of over $27,000,000 consisted chiefly of the products of the manufacturing industry of our people, and I desire to direct to it the special attention of those who fancy an extension of reciprocal trade with Canada would be injurious to the manufacturing population of the United States.

LARGE IMPORTS OF OUR MANUFACTURES.

One of the most efficient and beneficial means of protecting our manufactures would be to encourage the demand for them in Canada. Including the amounts given in the statement of the quantities and values of our domestic exports in the official records of the Bureau of Statistics, and the additions corrected from the reports furnished by the Canadian commissioners of customs, our exports last year of our own productions to the Dominion included books and stationery to the value of $794,846; cotton manufactures, besides raw cotton, $1,591,844; musical instruments, $639,027; leather and its manufactures, $789,428; tobacco and its manufactures, $1,673,366; refined sugar and molasses, $1,988,733; manufactures of iron and steel, $6,833,649, besides other manufactures to the value of many millions. Our imports during the same year from all parts of the Dominion of her staple productions of wheat and flour amounted only in value to $363,317.

If we can export our manufactures in such large quantities to Canada when impeded by her present tariff, it cannot be disputed that we should increase our sales of them if they were admitted at lower rates of duty, and yet more if they were admitted free of all duty whatever

THE FORMER TREATY.

The treaty of 1854 provided for a reciprocal trade between the United States and the British North American possessions in certain articles, consisting mainly of the unmanufactured productions of the farm, forest, mines, and fisheries. It was for several years mutually satisfactory, but under the pressure of debt and the need of increased revenue the Canadians raised the duties on manufactured goods to such an extent as to destroy its natural effects in promoting many branches of the industry of our people.

The Legislature of the State of New York passed concurrent resolutions complaining of the tariff thus exacted by Canada and demanding a revision of the treaty, but expressing approval of the principle of reciprocity and a desire for an extension of its application. It was seen that unrestricted trade between the United States and Canada must be mutually beneficial for the same reasons as make it desirable between New York and Pennsylvania or any of the other States in the Union.

The resolutions of the State of New York asserted that "free commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American possessions, developing the natural, geographical, and other advantages of each for the good of all, is conducive to the present interests of each, and is the only proper basis of our intercourse for all time to come;" and, in pursuance of the request of the State of New York, that its Senators and Representatives in Congress should take such steps as would regulate the commerce and navigation between the two countries in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, I moved in the House of Representatives that the President of the United States should be authorized and required to give notice to the British government that the treaty of commerce then existing, as to the British North American colonies, would be terminated at the earliest date legally permitted, but that the President should be authorized to appoint three commissioners for the revision of said treaty, and to confer with other commissioners duly authorized therefor, whenever it should appear to be the wish of the government of Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty between the governments and the people of both countries, based upon the true principles of reciprocity, and for the removal of existing difficulties.

RECIPROCITY APPROVED BY CONGRESS.

The preamble declared that inequality and injustice existed in our present intercourse with Canada, subversive of the true intent of the treaty, owing to the legislation of Canada after the treaty had been adopted, and that it was desirable that friendly relations should be entertained between the United States and the British North American provinces, and that commercial intercourse should be thereafter carried on between them upon principles reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory to both parties.

A motion to lay the preamble and resolution on the table was rejected by a vote of 76 to 73. Thus the House refused to terminate the treaty unconditionally. A notice simply to abrogate the treaty was voted down, and the preamble, which asserted that commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces should be hereafter carried on between them upon principles reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, was adopted; and the resolution would also have been carried if a few members who together with their constituents were conspicuously in favor of and especially interested in the utmost possible freedom of exchanges between the two countries had not been induced to believe that they would obtain better terms by postponement to the next session of Congress. But the postponement was only adopted by a majority of 5 out of 159 votes.

Just before the time for reconsideration arrived the war feeling had attained increased intensity, and the exigencies and temper of the occasion threw all commercial considerations temporarily aside.

CANADIAN TARIFF.

Since that time the Canadian tariff has undergone great and liberal changes. Very many of the articles on which we charge duties almost prohibitory are admitted free of all duty into Canada, and her old tariff of 25 or 30 per cent. has been reduced to a general rate of 17½ on manufactures, and can no longer be a subject for complaint of injustice on our part while we charge 40 or 60 per cent. We now approach the whole subject under new and favorable auspices.

OBSTACLES TO COMPLETE RECIPROCITY.

As the exports of Canada consist chiefly of raw productions of the farm and forest, of which we export little for actual consumption in Canada, the admission of these articles free of duty by each country into the territory of the other is not the most just or desirable form of reciprocity. To place our trade with the Dominion on a satisfactory basis, manufactures also should be admitted free of duty from each country into the other. But to effect this it is necessary that no higher duty should be levied in one country than in the other on iron, silk, wool, and the other materials of manufactures. Without this the country admitting them at low duties, or without any, would manifestly be able to undersell the other if it continued such duties as it might deem necessary for its revenue or prudent for the protection of its labor against the competition of countries under different social and monetary conditions.

The best arrangement of reciprocal trade between the two countries must include more or less the manufactured as well as the raw productions of each, thus giving mutual encouragement to various and differing industries on both sides of the line and permitting labor in each to adjust itself to the most advantageous employments. The United States have never yet made decisive efforts to secure the benefits thus within their grasp.

If such a system of reciprocal exchanges could be extended to manufactured productions, both countries would assuredly profit. The first effect might seem detrimental to special interests in both, but a natural equilibrium would soon establish itself, producing conditions under which capital and labor would be applied to the best advantages. It would be found what each country can produce better and more cheaply for the other than the latter can for itself, and under such circumstances each would obviously be the gainer by mutual exchanges. It is the nature of trade that it will not long be continued unless all the parties gain by it. Both as producers and consumers the people of each country would profit by such an economical adjustment of affairs.

As many manufactures in both countries are made of materials imported from various parts of the world, it would manifestly be impossible to establish a completely free system of commercial intercourse with Canada, except under duties not only corresponding but also equitably divided on the productions of other countries. This is the chief obstacle to any fair, mutually advantageous, and complete arrangement of reciprocity between us.

If, for instance, wearing-apparel, of which we formerly sold large quantities to the Canadians, were included in a list of free exchanges between us and them, without any more fundamental and comprehensive change, Canada, by admitting free of duty wool, or, if she chose, cloth and the other articles used in making the apparel, could undersell us so far as to drive us out of our own markets. The principle thus illustrated is applicable to almost all other manufactures. The materials for manufactures of wood, wool, and iron are already brought into Canada either free of all imports or under nominal duties for the purpose of encouraging cheap production. There is nothing to prevent their being admitted wholly free. Under these circumstances the Canadian manufacturers would have an unjust advantage over those of our own country. On our side we might reverse all this by a lower tariff or a system of bounties. But if the materials of manufactures were admitted on the same terms into the United States and the Dominion and an equitable distribution made of the revenues, the manufactures of each might safely and profitably be admitted into the other. In fact, with our larger capital and more advanced manufactories we should have an advantage in the competition, while it would also inure to the benefit of the Canadian people.

INTERESTS OF OUR MERCHANT FORWARDERS.

Manufactures are not the only form of industry which is worthy of consideration. The interests of our merchants and forwarders, as well as the people of Canada, are seriously injured by the present obstacles to their intercourse. There is a great difference between a bonded system and a system of perfect freedom, as to exports or imports. The annoyances, vexations, and delays necessarily attached to any bonded system are often sufficient in this day of easy communication to turn away business from its natural and best center. It is also to be remembered that hitherto the Government of the United States has not thought it expedient to refund duties on the re-exportation of foreign merchandise in less quantities than the original package, thus creating an obstacle, often amounting to prohibition, to the jobbing and retailing of goods.

That the mere adoption of the same rates of duties in the United States and Canada on articles imported from other countries would not be politic is evident on the ground that customs-revenue is chiefly collected in a few ports, although ultimately paid by the consumers, often in very remote parts of the country.

A CUSTOMS UNION SUGGESTED.

All these difficulties might be solved by adopting the principles embodied in the Zollverein or Prussian confederacy of the German states, with such modifications as may be found expedient between ourselves and the Canadians. By this course both can obtain all the commercial advantages of union without political entanglement, leaving each country free to practice in its own self-government such rules as it believes to be most in accordance with the genius of its people, and best adapted to promote its own interests.

Previous to the adoption of the Zollverein, it had been the misfortune of Germany to be divided into a large number of independent states—most of them of petty dimensions and small population—every one having distinct custom-houses, tariff and revenue laws, often differing very widely from those of the neighbors surrounding it. Sometimes one part of a state was separated from its other parts, and was as a commercial island encompassed by states having different laws. The condition was such as would have existed in New York or any other of our States, if each of the different counties had been commercially divided from the rest, and the inhabitants of one county could not, without paying heavy imposts, pass into another with a horse, ox, or load of grain, the product of their own farms, or take imported goods into any of the counties adjoining their own, and the difficulty continually increased on passing through additional counties. Thus the inland trade of Germany was subjected to all the restrictions that are usually laid on the intercourse between distant and independent states.

PRINCIPLES OF THE ZOLLVEREIN.

The principle of the Zollverein or customs union is that there shall be entire and unrestricted freedom of imports, exports, and transit among all the states which are its members. The same duties are collected on the outside frontier of the states thus united. Within that line all trade is as untrammeled as within our present Union. An equitable distribution of the revenue thus obtained is made among all the states of the confederation.

The Zollverein is comprehensively defined to be the association of a number of states for the establishment of a common customs law and customs line with regard to foreign countries, and for the suppression of both in the intercourse of the States within the border line. There would be no impediment by discriminating duties on the importations for Toronto if made via New York or Boston. If the merchants of Chicago found it to their interest to purchase at Montreal, they could do so; and buyers from the new province of Manitoba might buy and sell at Saint Paul, Du Luth, Saint Louis, or New Orleans, as freely as at Halifax or any city in the Dominion. The merchants of British Columbia would buy and sell in the markets of San Francisco as freely and with as little hinderance as in those of their own country. All means of transit would be entirely open to the people of both countries, and those most conducive to the public welfare would take the trade. Internal-revenue laws could, so far as necessary, be made in conformity with the principles of the Union. There could be fair and complete competition everywhere within the confederation, and full scope could be given to the development of natural advantages wherever they would bring profit to the merchant and save needless labor of the people or yield remunerative employment to them.

SKETCH OF THE GERMAN ZOLLVEREIN.

The German Zollverein began in 1818, considerably more than half a century ago. Its progress is a sufficient proof of the excellence of the principles it embodies and of the mode by which they are carried into effect. The enlightened state of Prussia was the originator and leader in the movement, by forming a commercial union with a few minor states; the whole population thus included being at first only nineteen millions. The experience of the benefits thus created is so satisfactory, that the best publicists of Europe believe that Prussia thus conferred upon the German people advantages scarcely inferior to those she initiated by the diffusion of education and intelligence. It not only promoted the industry and prosperity of the allied states more than any other measure or sets of measures that their governments could have devised, but it was found that the increase of wealth and population thus arising created an additional demand for foreign products.

Whatever opposition there is to unembarrassed intercourse with Canada proceeds mainly from a fear lest it might revolutionize our tariff or injure our revenue. It is well to remind the alarmists who raise this outcry that such results are no necessary consequence of an American zollverein. So far as the Zollverein of Germany is a precedent, such apprehensions are entirely groundless. As Prussia was the largest and most populous country when the Zollverein was begun, her tariff was adopted; and owing to increased prosperity and the consequently increased consumption of tax-paying articles, the revenue of Prussia rose about 30 per cent. in the four years next following the amalgamation of the North German and South German states into one grand union on the 1st of January, 1834.

In 1865 the benefits of the German Zollverein had become so well proved and appreciated, that instead of the three original states or duchies it included fourteen, with a population of nearly 36,000,000.

The solidity and cohesive power of the Zollverein were decisively tested in the war which began between Prussia and Austria in 1866. The governments of the North German states included in the union sided with Austria, and it was feared that a dissolution of the Zollverein would ensue, but, says one of the historians of the time, the extraordinary spectacle was presented that while "its component parts were waging open war with each other, its custom-house authorities remained in their functions in the general name and received and divided the revenue moneys in the general name, a spectacle which surprised nobody in Germany, but caused general astonishment abroad as something quite incomprehensible. German nationality, and the inner conserving power which animates the Zollverein received hereby the most glorious confirmation."

After the war of 1866 the German states to the south of the river Main, having preserved their independence, were not under any obligation to renew the Zollverein, but preferred to continue members of it. In 1867 a new Zollverein treaty was concluded between the states of the North German Confederation and the North German states, the scope of which extended to the whole of Germany except Austria. Even with Austria a liberal and comprehensive treaty was effected in 1868, mutually reducing duties on both sides and abolishing all transit duties and nearly all those on exports.

A traveler who has crossed the outer line is freed from the vexations of the douanier in every part of Germany, and may proceed without interruption from Belgium to the frontier of Russia, and from Tyrol to the Baltic, a distance of seven hundred or eight hundred miles, including a population of 70,000,000.

MUTUAL BENEFIT OF A CUSTOMS UNION.

Until the Canadians are ready for annexation to the United States by their own appreciation of republican institutions, no solution of the commercial questions at issue between us and them can be complete except by means of a customs union. I, for one, am not desirous of incorporating in our political union 4,000,000 of people who desire a form of government essentially distinct from our own. But it by no means follows that we and they should not mutually develop in harmony our material interests and regard them and the character of our respective populations as a basis on which such future political arrangements may be made as time may prove to be wise. The quality of grain or lumber and the desirability of selling or purchasing manufactures are utterly independent of the political preferences of the producers or consumers, and on neither side can natural prosperity be promoted by chronic commercial jealousy.

It is evident that the policy I advocate would tend to lessen the hostility of differently instituted governments, while it would not interfere with the political institutions of any, and that a strong bias toward the most friendly relations on other points must naturally arise upon the basis of mutual pecuniary interests and intimate social intercourse.

THAT "BALANCE OF TRADE."

Meeting upon their own ground the theorists who regard "a balance of trade in our favor" as the chief test of the benefits of commercial exchanges with any single country, I find that, according to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, there appears to have been during the thirteen years when a treaty for the reciprocal exchange of grain, lumber, and many other natural productions existed, a balance in our favor amounting to some $83,000,000, and that ever since the termination of the treaty until 1874, when the pressure on our affairs tended to force sales at low prices, there has been a balance against the United States in the trade with the Dominion. So much for the present exclusive policy in comparison with the more liberal but incomplete system under the treaty, judging them from the ordinary stand-point of many protectionists.

Since the termination of the treaty the proportion of the trade of Canada with this country in comparison with the whole foreign trade has been reduced from 52 to 35 per cent., until the necessities of our people compelled them to part with the products of their labor at reduced prices.

The tariff of Canada is moderate as compared with our own; but, in connection with our taxation of many materials, it is enough to have caused some important branches of manufacture, notably those of wood-screws and musical instruments, to be lately transferred by our own citizens to the other side of the northern frontier, where they are not only established for the supply of the people of the Dominion, but, if we persist in our present course, will undoubtedly at no distant date compete on terms favorable to the Canadians in neutral markets with the products of our own labor on a very extensive scale and in many various manufactures.

THE REAL BALANCE.

While it is desirable to encourage as far as we are able the sales of our manufactures to Canada, it is always to be remembered that the trade between that country and the United States is to a considerable extent one of transit or carrying to other countries, and thus what is called "a balance" against us, which is really an advantage, may exist, because it may merely represent what we have bought from one country to sell at a profit to others. If our merchants buy the bulky productions of Canada to the extent of many millions and carry them through our own country to our sea-ports, they give employment to our laborers, create a demand for the products of our farmers, and cause the expenditure and employment of vast sums of money among our traders and capitalists, while the articles thus carried and exported stand to our credit and profitably swell the balance in our favor in other countries, being at least as valuable in our exchanges with the rest of the world as if they were gold or silver.

The Canadians, understanding this natural operation of the simple laws of business and carrying it into their affairs of state, have, with an enlightened self-interest, attempted to diminish what might by more short-sighted economists be called "the balance in their favor," by admitting our wheat, flour, corn, oats, barley, pease, and many other productions entirely free of all duty. They would like the exchange to be much more—as some of our doctrinaires would call it—"against them." The more of our wheat, corn, and flour they buy, or, in other words, "the larger the balance against them," the more their shipping and canals, and with them their merchants and the rest of their population, prosper. We take the other course, and by way of fancied "protection" levy a duty of twenty cents a bushel on their wheat, fifteen cents on their barley, ten cents on their oats, 20 per cent. on their flour, and from 10 to 20 per cent. on their pease.

Under the treaty, the quantities of grain exchanged between the two countries were almost exactly equal. In 1874 our exports of grain and breadstuffs to the Dominion, exclusive of barley, for which we pay Canada a better price than she can find elsewhere, amounted to $16,477,674, while the imports of the corresponding articles were $3,473,352, showing what is called "a balance in our favor" of $13,004,322; our exports of grain and breadstuffs to Canada, as thus shown, being, in consequence of our duties on her products and her exemption of ours, more than four times as large as our imports from her. This "balance in our favor" shows that we expel the trade in certain classes of products from our shipping, railroads, elevators, and warehouses with incalculable injury to all classes of our people and force it into Canadian channels. This is more fully shown by the official reports of Canada, where it appears that in the same year nearly twenty-one millions of bushels of grain were certainly exported from that country, being between six and seven millions of bushels more than her imports.

Thus we see that the purchases of grain by Canada are for re-exportation, either directly or for such consumption as leaves a corresponding surplus on her own side for exportation. No bonded system regarding grain from Canada can afford such facilities for profits by our merchants, millers, carriers, and others as would arise from free and untrammeled trade in it.

WE DRIVE AWAY THE TRADE WE MIGHT ATTRACT.

The enlargement of the Canadian canals, with a view yet further to draw away from this country the transit of its own productions and trade in them is at the present moment going on, and that on a magnificent scale. In 1855, the year after the treaty went into operation, as soon as routes and markets of the United States were opened freely to the grain, flour, and timber of Canada, the trade by way of the Saint Lawrence was $18,469,528, or not much more than half its amount in the previous year. The decrease was $15,203,600, and a corresponding amount was transferred to other carriers, for the Canadian trade in the United States increased in the same time $15,856,624, or from $24,971,096 to $40,827,720. In view of these facts, the urgency of removing from those who are employed on our railroads, rivers, and canals the restrictions imposed on them by duties on Canadian grain, and placing them on an equal footing with their foreign competitors, cannot be reasonably disputed.

If we bought from Canada every bushel of wheat that she now exports to other countries, the demand in those countries would remain the same. The difference would chiefly be that after paying for it in the products of our labor, we should send it or its equivalent to the present consumers and that we should do the business and make the profits now made by the Canadians. If there should be what some call "a balance against us" with Canada, it would be more than made up through the amounts placed to our credit by our sales to other countries.

AN INCREASED SUPPLY OF PROVISIONS.

Mainly for those agricultural productions which are not "perishable" and will bear transportation the markets of the world at large regulate our own. The prices alike of grain and dairy products are transmitted by cable and eagerly examined by the dealers in them on this side of the Atlantic. The free admission of these articles into this country will stimulate industry without reducing general prices, not only through increasing the business of our railroads, canals, rivers, and sea-ports, but by furnishing them to consumers as nearly as possible to the places where they are produced, and by passing them through the hands of the fewest intermediate dealers. There are also many agricultural products—notably animals and fresh meats—which might profitably be exchanged by Canada for our manufactures, thus furnishing an increased and cheaper supply of provisions to our people, who, under the system I advocate, would pay for them in the products of their looms and workshops.

Even as to these articles many errors are current. It appears from the tables published by the Bureau of Statistics that last year our imports described as animals from the British American colonies amounted to $1,987,231, and those of meats, butter, cheese, poultry, lard, &c., to $533,886; a total of $2,521,117. An outcry is raised that our farmers are oppressed by these inundations of provisions. But their amount is little more than equal to our exports of meats alone to Canada. Their amount is no less than $2,457,904. Of animals, meats, butter, cheese, lard, and tallow only our exports to the same country were $4,398,060, or about two millions more than our imports.

FREE TRADE IN COAL.

It would be improper to pass without examination our trade with Canada in coal, an article which is one of the essential elements of manufactures, and in the North becoming daily more and more one of the prime necessaries of human life. It is found in abundance on the sea-coast of Canada, whence it is advantageously exported to the New England States and New York. But it is not found in the interior and well-settled parts of the Dominion. They depend on our mines for a supply, and obtain it, free of all duties, principally from Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio. Anthracite coal is extensively imported into the maritime provinces. Altogether, regarding the subject from a national point of view, our imports of coal last year from Canada amounted to $697,673, and our exports to her were, as shown by our own returns alone, $2,034,527. The imports, taking a series of years, are nearly stationary; but our exports increase enormously, and in the last three years were $7,272,964, not far from four times as large as in the three years from 1863 to 1867. Under these circumstances any imposition of duty on coal from the Dominion is evidently unjust, favorable only to petty local interests at the cost of important communities and contrary to the spirit in which each part of the Union should regard all the others.

WE PAY OUR OWN TAXES.

Among our largest imports from Canada, timber is probably on the whole the one most necessary to our citizens. It forms a part of every house in city and country. It is directly or indirectly a part of almost every manufacture, and the cost of the home of every workman in the manufacturing parts of our country depends upon its price. Considered with regard to the tariff and its "protective" character, lumber is unlike any other article. Our iron-ore being inexhaustible, the production of that metal may be stimulated to any extent. The more there is made of it the more can be made. The same is true of manufactures of wool and cotton, or of those articles themselves. Looms, sheep, and cotton plantations can be almost indefinitely multiplied. But, for all intents and purposes, a high price for lumber is not only a tax on the people, but stimulates present production with the absolute certainty of speedy, spendthrift, exhaustion of the supply. By duties on Canadian lumber we simply exhaust our resources and pay for drawing what we need from places remote or difficult of access when we might get it easier elsewhere. It would be even more reasonable to dig holes and fill them up again than to indulge in this delusive and extravagant legislation.

There has been a too common belief that by duties on the productions of Canada we make her people pay our taxes. Perhaps the fallacy yet lingers in some minds. The fact that we have destroyed our importations of wheat and flour from Canada, and that she now sends her surplus together with much of our own to other markets, may convince of their error some of those who have imagined she must depend upon us for the sales of her productions. It was argued when the treaty was repealed and a duty was imposed on Canadian timber that we should buy it as cheaply as ever. Instead of this consummation, it has been found that our importations became nearly threefold as large as before, and that the prices in Canada doubled, showing clearly that we pay the duty and injure every branch of industry in which northern timber is a material.

The well-known fact is that we are rapidly exhausting our supplies of timber in the Northern States. The demand for it increases at the rate of 25 per cent. a year, and even those who are interested in high prices and immediate sales of what is left of it admit that in twenty years building timber will be extremely scarce, and that in many parts of the country, yet supplied in part from their own soil, it will have entirely disappeared. It is stated on good authority that no less than 63,928 establishments, employing 393,378 persons and using material to the value of $310,000,000 a year, were engaged in 1869 in manufacturing articles entirely from wood, in addition to 7,439,840 persons partly employed on wood and using that material yearly to the value of $554,000,000. In some instances, following the example of more experienced nations, premiums are given to those who plant certain areas with forest trees. Yet in the face of all these facts we, under the name of "protection," betray the public interests into the hands of a few monopolists, and condemn our people to pay large rewards for the too rapid destruction of our remaining forests. In considering these facts it is desirable to remember that under a free system of exchanges Canada would be paid for her lumber in the products of our labor.

PUBLIC OPINION ON TRADE WITH CANADA.

The value of an extension of trade with Canada is duly appreciated by all thoughtful commercial men. The National Board of Trade passed resolutions and petitioned Congress in its favor. The New York Chamber of Commerce regards it as "specially desirable, on political as well as economical grounds, that all unnecessary hinderances should be removed from the commercial intercourse between the United States and the great Dominion which borders our northern border for so many thousands of miles," and "strongly recommends the proper authorities at Washington to enter into such treaty stipulations whenever the Canadian authorities may be found ready to meet them on a basis of perfect fairness and equity." The boards of trade in Boston and Chicago, and many other similar associations, have earnestly expressed the same views. Various State Legislatures, notably that of New York, have passed resolutions to the same effect. Proof that the importance of the interests involved is fully appreciated, and of a willingness to negotiate, abounds in Canada.

CANADA WILLING TO NEGOTIATE.

In 1873 the Dominion board of trade presented a memorial to Earl Dufferin, the governor-general of the Dominion, expressing a "sincere and cordial desire" that he would "be pleased to make such representations to the imperial government as will procure the appointment of a commission to meet and confer with a similar commission on the part of the Government of the United States, (if such commission has been or shall be appointed,) for the purpose of framing and negotiating such a treaty of reciprocal trade as will be for the mutual advantage and benefit of the trade and commerce of the Dominion of Canada and the United States." The Canadian minister of customs, the privy council, and the governor-general fully concurred in these views, and the governor, in council, formally promised that "should the Government of the United States comply with the wishes expressed by the National Board of Trade, the subject will receive the fullest consideration of the government of Canada." There is good reason for believing that no change has been made in their views.

During the present year a leading member of the Dominion board of trade, at its annual meeting, expressed the general sentiment of those who were present by saying, "We are anxious to deal fairly and liberally with our neighbors, and on condition that they meet us in a liberal spirit." A resolution was passed, declaring "that this board is of opinion that it is very desirable that a treaty of reciprocity in trade with the United States, on a comprehensive, liberal, and fair basis, should be obtained; and is also of opinion that the initiatory steps thereto ought to come from the Government of the United States, seeing that it was by their action that the old treaty was abrogated." Thus there is ample proof that commissioners would be promptly appointed to meet and confer with our own.

While we now possess a most valuable market and increasing market for our manufactures, it is quite as certain that its continuance depends on the duties levied by the Canadian tariff. A large proportion of the manufactures we export so extensively to the Dominion, conspicuously many of iron, copper, brass, lead, cotton, &c., are admitted free of duty or at almost nominal rates of 5 or 10 per cent., and those charged at higher rates than 17½ per cent. are few in number and insignificant in quantity. The Canadians have it in their power, and it could be no just cause of complaint by us, to adopt our own scale of duties. The effect of such a step could not fail to inflict serious injury on our manufacturers, many of whose products would soon be excluded from the Canadian markets, which it is for our interest to open yet more widely.

CONTRAST CANADIAN WITH HAWAIIAN TRADE.

The importance of our present and future commercial relations with the Hawaiian Islands has been ably discussed. I have not underestimated nor will I now depreciate it. But it shrinks into seeming insignificance in comparison with the value of the trade between the people of the United States and Canada. In the same year when our exports of cereal productions to the islands amounted to the value of about $45,000 those to the Dominion were of the value of over fourteen millions, our exports of cotton and its manufactures to the islands were about $16,000, and of iron and steel, including woodenware, were nearly $20,000, while those of the same classes to Canada were over one million one hundred thousand and over six millions, respectively, exclusive of woodenware. The exports I have specified to Canada are exclusively of our own productions, the aggregate of which to Canada was about ninety times as large as that of all our exports to the Hawaiian Islands during the same time. Without pursuing the comparison further it is absolutely unquestionable that, if our commerce with the Hawaiian Islands is worthy of special attention, that with the Dominion of Canada is almost immeasurably more so; and the comparison loses nothing of its force either commercially, politically, or in a military point of view if we consider the limited area of the islands and the vast territory of the Dominion coterminous with our own to be inhabited by people sprung from ourselves or, like ourselves, from the foremost nations of the Old World and whose number will be computed by hundreds of millions.

ENCOURAGEMENTS TO SMUGGLING.

While the moderate rates of duty exacted by the Canadian tariff enable us to make large exports of manufactures, they also permit goods from other countries to be imported on the same terms. Silks, broadcloth, plate, watches, jewelry, &c., are charged with a duty of only 17½ per cent. The boundary between the two countries not only extends across the continent, but the shore-line is increased for thousands of miles by innumerable bays, affording great facilities for defrauding the revenue. At other places a smuggler can go in the day or night from one side of the frontier to the other laden with jewelry, laces, or other expensive goods literally as easily and with as much security as a traveler can pass from one farm to another or through the unbroken forest. It is stated that stores, kept by enterprising merchants, are built on the imaginary or mathematical line separating the two countries, and that goods bought in each are sold freely to all customers; the merchandise itself changing places from the shelves on one side to those on the other at those hours and opportunities when it is impossible for a custom-house officer, however vigilant, to watch what may be done inside the building. No wonder, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury shou'd have found "the difficulty attending a proper surveillance of our northern frontier" of sufficient importance as to direct special attention to it in his last report as being "under existing circumstances very great, if not in some respects insurmountable." To guard these lines with moderate security an enormous increase of the revenue service would even now be absolutely indispensable. In the four collection districts of Vermont, Champlain, Oswegatchie, and Cape Vincent, having a frontier line of more than three hundred miles, after deducting for a few officers employed in permanent service at the principal ports and minor stations, "there remain," says the Secretary of the Treasury, "but fourteen as a preventive force, or less than one man for every twenty-one miles of frontier."

As the frontier regions become more populous and goods brought from one country to the other meet with readier sales, these difficulties will be incalculably increased and it will be absolutely impossible to prevent immense quantities of valuable goods from being illicitly brought across the line without payment of any duty.

In addition to these suggestive facts it is to be remembered that some of the most liberal and advanced statesmen in Great Britain, not content with the present anomalous relations of the mother-country and the colonies, entertain the project of a Zollverein or customs-union between them. The people of these countries have as undoubted rights to free-trade with each other as the citizens of our different States now enjoy among themselves.

But, if the difficulties attending our present tariff are now "in some respects insurmountable," what would they become if the same freedom of trade as exists between the States of the Union were also a matter of fact between the different parts of the British Empire? There is no complete remedy but such a customs-union as I have suggested between the United States and the Dominion.

COMMISSIONERS WOULD REPORT IMPARTIALLY.

In proposing the appointment of commissioners to confer with other commissioners duly authorized by the government of Great Britain, or whenever it shall appear to be the wish of that government to appoint such commissioners, to investigate and ascertain on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States and the Dominion of Canada can be negotiated, and to report the results of their investigation to the President of the United States, there is no bias toward any special form of reciprocity. They may or may not approve of such a customs-union as under existing circumstances seems to me the best and only perfect solution of the embarrassments attending the present commercial relations of the two countries, as it would effect a great saving in the revenue service, abolish smuggling, give complete freedom of transit to the people on both sides, and by a continuous and harmonious development of their resources encourage social intercourse and prepare the way for whatever other institutions their intelligence and mutual good-will might hereafter suggest and approve. But between such an arrangement and the present condition of trade there are many intermediate steps. It ought not to be difficult to agree upon the basis of a common tariff on all articles, such as silks, laces, brandies, wines, jewelry, &c., the importation of which is taxed only for revenue, and in regard to which no irreconcilable differences of politico-economical theory arise, or to determine the terms of equitable division of the revenue collected from them in common. If this only were done, the most extensive smuggling from which the revenue of the United States suffers would be stopped, and our own public Treasury would be the gainer by many millions. Some at least of the manufactures and raw products of each country could be admitted to free exchange with those of the other.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.

Beyond these considerations, or rather as their basis, are the plain and well-known facts that the prosperity of our people and our strength as a nation depend upon their unrestricted exchanges of the products of their labor more than upon any other material cause, and that the relative positions of the United States and the Dominion render similar commercial relations no less valuable to our citizens and the Canadians; that if permitted to develop themselves harmoniously, according to the unrestricted wishes of the people, the mutual interests of the two countries are even more important than those of many of our own States, and that whatever would directly benefit so large a number of them must be profitable to them all and should be desired by all.

Whatever arrangements may be made might properly include various regulations necessary for the freedom and convenience of our commercial and social neighborhood and intercourse, such as a uniform system of extradition, light-houses, copyrights, postage, patents, telegraphs, weights, measures, and coinage.

The principles I am desirous of seeing brought into active use are simply those expressed nearly a century ago by Girard, Franklin, Deane, and Lee in a treaty of commerce between France and the United States, in which they, on the part of this country, agreed to avoid "all those burdensome prejudices which are usually sources of debate, embarrassment, and discontent," and to take as the "basis of their agreement the most perfect equality and reciprocity," "founding the advantage of commerce solely upon reciprocal utility and the just rules of free intercourse." Thus all petty, acrimonious debates as to whether one party would make more or less than the other would cease. All would be merged in considerations of plain and palpable benefit as far as it is between States and individuals in the Union.

It is undeniable that the government and people of Canada are desirous of meeting in a friendly and liberal spirit whatever efforts we may make toward extending our trade with them. Thus apparently the means of benefiting a large and suffering portion of our population are open to us by giving them employment through an extended market for their productions. How much this is needed may be estimated from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, that our domestic exports to all countries decreased in value $70,149,321 last year. By opening trade with Canada we should also furnish our people with a more abundant supply of the necessaries of life and some of the materials for manufactures. The purpose of the resolutions now under consideration is simply to ascertain, after full and careful investigation by intelligent citizens of the United States, how far and through what measures we can best bring into actual practice the opportunities which are placed within our reach by the circumstances of the times and by immutable nature, or rather by Providence itself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the naval appropriation bill.

No. 3480) to provide for the recomputation of the accounts between the United States and the city of Baltimore growing out of money expended by said city for the use and benefit of the United States during the war of 1812 with Great Britain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Mr. DOBBINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3481) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PALMETTO GUARD.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Palmetto Guard of Charleston, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, April 29, 1876.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial and petition of the undersigned, officers and members of the centennial committee of the Palmetto Guard, a military company at Charleston, South Carolina, respectfully show:

That they are preparing and erecting a suitable monument at Charleston in memory of the battle of Fort Moultrie, successfully fought against a British fleet on the 28th day of June, 1776.

That said monument is to be surmounted by a figure in bronze of a Continental soldier replacing the flag of the fort, which had been shot down, and they pray your honorable body to cause to be delivered to them for said purpose bronze cannon-metal of the weight of forty-five hundred pounds.

They have been advised and understand that there is on hand of captured or disabled cannon ample quantities of such metal belonging to the United States, and they ask that so much of it may be devoted to this patriotic purpose.

GEORGE L. BUIST,
BENJAMIN C. WEBB,
JULIUS J. WESCOAT, and others.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, South Carolina, May 1, 1876.

I cordially indorse and approve the above request. Such an act of grace would produce the most beneficial results to this State and to the country.

D. H. CHAMBERLAIN,
Governor, South Carolina.

CONTINUANCE OF COMMITTEE-CLERKS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to report the following resolution and to ask that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State be, and they are hereby, allowed to employ a clerk for the period of thirty days, and the compensation of said clerk be fixed at $4 per diem.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I am also directed by the same committee to report the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The resolution was adopted.

PAINTED OR STAINED GLASS.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for an amendment to section 2505 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the importation of painted or stained glass for religious purposes, for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, respectfully represent:

That under the revenue laws of the United States religious societies from 1861 to 1874 enjoyed the same privileges as philosophical, educational, scientific, and literary societies and institutions;

That the word "religious" was omitted from the act of June 22, 1874, and from section 2505, schedule M, title 33, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Your petitioners therefore pray that this inequitable and invidious discrimination against religious societies and institutions and against the cause for which they are organized and established be removed, and that an act be passed to insert the word "religious" after the word "scientific" and before the words "or literary" in section 2505, schedule M, title 33, Revised Statutes of the United States,

SAM. H. WELSH,
EDW. Y. BUCKLEY,
LAWRENCE LEWIS,
and many others.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move by unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, there is an old legend of the seven wise men of Greece which tells of the finding of a golden tripod in the nets of a Milesian fisherman. The Delphian oracle was asked to whom it should be given. The answer was, to the wisest man. The fisherman's patriotic pride led him to offer it to his own countryman, Thales. He declined it with modesty, and offered it to Bias of Priene. Thus it passed in succession through the hands of the seven wise men until Solon dedicated it to Apollo as alone worthy to be called "the wise."

But the true moral to be drawn from the fabled history of this Apollo even is that he who gave oracles to all the world was not wise enough to look into his own fortunes; for he gave up all in the vain pursuit of the inexorable Daphne.

Learned men are often unwise; they are impractical. It was a severe but not ill-founded judgment pronounced by one, when he said if he had a province to punish, he would send a philosopher to govern it. That practical wisdom which shall in these days look through the mist and fog of speculative philosophy and attenuated theory and discover the true condition of the country and the prime causes of its troubles and dangers would indeed entitle its possessor to the designation of "the wise."

In this presence I would not even enter the lists to contend for such a prize. Doubtless it would prove the unreached paradise of my earthly despair. And yet there are some facts lying so near the surface of our financial embarrassment that the shortest vision may discover them. Amid the jarring, conflicting opinions unfortunately existing here and obstructing legislation, the only important monetary measure we have been able thus far to adopt is the so-called silver bill. During its consideration it occurred to me as one of the strangest complexities of the times that even silver money should be distrusted and discredited. Certainly it is an old-fashioned money, and the people like it. It is historic. Our fathers prized it. And I am persuaded, if the American Congress could divest itself of that notion which might not inaptly be termed the financial alchemy, that must first transmute everything into gold-interest-bearing bonds before any principle can be reduced to practical utility, we would have made an advance in the effort to bring back the appearance, if not the substance, of the good olden times. For the moral effect of some legislation is better than its intrinsic merit. Confidence and stability are important factors in monetary matters. Fear is the worst element in all panics. Hope is the life-power that moves all enterprise and anchors all prosperity.

After the accumulation in the Treasury of $10,000,000 in silver, at a loss to the Government of $1,000,000, the people demanded its utilization by forcing it into circulation. They would be glad to see this circulation still further promoted by securing to the citizen who may have bullion the right to go to the mints, under governmental regulations, and have coined his silver bullion on payment of the seigniorage. Yet some of us do not think it either the part of wisdom or sound policy to assume either the responsibility of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to execute the blundering legislation of the republican party in the resumption act or to authorize him to issue more gold-interest-bearing bonds to buy up a depreciated and fluctuating silver metal which, under the refinement of prevailing jobbery, might inure more to the benefit of the "bonanza" kings than the people. For one, I cannot give my consent to involve the Government in additional bonded indebtedness until all honest, determined effort be made in other directions for financial relief. The curse of this country to-day is its bonded debt. We are a nation under bonds. The great mass of the American people are but hod-carriers to build palaces for the nabobs who clip coupons from public and local bonds. And I apprehend that if the inner springs of the movement to-day from certain quarters in favor of abrupt, immediate resumption could be seen, the fact would be disclosed that the bondholders are not so much in favor of specie payments as a wise public policy as they are to secure gold, the most valuable of all coins, in payment of their bonds, for which they paid in greenbacks an average of about sixty-five cents on the dollar.

The republican party set the example of issuing bonds at a high rate of interest. While England on her debt of $4,000,000,000 pays $120,000,000 annual interest, we on our $2,200,000,000 pay $132,000,000.

This bad example of the Government in issuing high-interest-bearing bonds, non-taxable, produced results of a most vicious, hurtful nature, often lost sight of in our inquiries into the true philosophy of the financial embarrassments of the American people. It not only drew from less productive investments in industrial pursuits the capital of the country, visibly checking its development, but it hid these investments from taxation, leaving the industrial producing classes to bear the whole burden of supporting the Government.

Nor was this all. It set in motion a like pernicious practice throughout the States and their local subdivisions, stimulating frenzied speculation in bonds, inciting the people and bribing officials to issue State, county, and municipal bonds bearing exorbitant rates of interest for the most ordinary and extraordinary objects. A somewhat careful study of this question discloses a most appalling state of affairs in this country. One of its most startling phases is the marvelous ratio of increase of municipal indebtedness in the past few years. The census computation for 1870, little reliable at best, gives no premise from which any safe deduction can be approximately made as to the condition of this class of debts to-day. The census for 1870 gives $330,867,714 for this debt. In the last eight years the increase has been fearful. In New York City it has been increased fourfold. Philadelphia has doubled her debt. Saint Louis has gone from $5,500,000 to $16,500,000. Chicago has trebled her debt. The debt of Baltimore has increased 69 per cent., Allegheny City 500 per cent., and Albany 250 per cent. Boston has jumped from $13,000,000 to $43,000,000. Cleveland has quadrupled. Detroit has doubled. Louisville has doubled. Milwaukee has nearly trebled. Newark has gone from $2,110,300 to $5,600,000; New Orleans from $14,000,000 to $22,000,000. Portland has trebled. Providence has multiplied sevenfold. Richmond has doubled. Rochester has increased fivefold; Pittsburgh four and a half.

So that in these nineteen cities alone where the aggregate debts in 1867 were not $100,000,000 they are to-day in round numbers $332,000,000, a net increase of $232,000,000 or 232 per cent., being within $867,714 of the computation made in the census of 1870 for the entire indebtedness of all the cities and towns of the Union.

There are eighteen other cities with an aggregate debt of $105,342,570, to wit:

Augusta, Georgia	$1,751,000
Bangor	2,484,000
Brooklyn	17,432,000
Charleston	5,514,814
Cincinnati	15,547,000
Columbus, Georgia	572,800
Elizabeth, New Jersey	5,402,000
Galveston	872,000
Indianapolis	1,454,500
Jersey City	14,239,850
Memphis	3,985,500
Mobile	2,863,109
Newark	8,716,000
Pittsburgh	12,783,535
San Francisco	3,421,000
Savannah, Georgia	3,668,063
Saint Joseph	1,380,900
Saint Paul	1,231,262

The aggregate debt of all the other cities and towns, from the best data at my command, may be approximately estimated at $250,000,000. The whole municipal debt therefore is about $687,342,570. The average interest is not far from 7 per cent. per annum, which would be $48,113,979 annual tax on this debt alone. The county debts are not far from $225,000,000. The State indebtedness I put at $450,000,000. The aggregate of this threefold indebtedness is therefore $1,362,342,570. The debt of the District of Columbia is $23,143,000. The national debt on the 1st day of April, 1876, was $2,224,671,860.41. The entire bonded debt of the country is consequently $3,610,157,430.41.

In the foregoing calculations no account is taken of the vast amount of bonded indebtedness of those business corporations which embrace in a sort of governmental form miniature communities of men; nor does it embrace the contingent liability of the States and municipal corporations, which may have to be paid, and which in the commercial world so much affects their credit; nor does it embrace individual indebtedness.

Furthermore, the American people, unlike the English and French, are not the holders of all their obligations, so that the interest money paid by the debtor to the creditor class passes from one citizen to another, whereby it is kept in circulation in their midst; but from the most authentic statistics, freest from exaggeration, it may be asserted that our foreign debt is not far from $15,000,000,000; so the volume of interest money to meet these obligations annually flowing out from our shores never returns to bless us; while our cisatlantic creditors are the favored class, who either by adroit legislation or management make little contribution to appease the tax-gatherer who comes with such unfaltering regularity, through sunshine or shadow, in our adversity as in our prosperity.

When we consider the interest on this $36,000,000,000 of debt, to which must be added our annual public expenditures, which, exclusive of interest on the national debt and the Pacific Railroad bonds, is $335,638,201.16, and the expenses of conducting the State, territorial, county, and municipal governments, we can begin to see what becomes of the earnings of the producing classes of this country, and how little they have left to live on. It must be borne in mind, too, that no corresponding benefit has accrued to the material interests of this country on the issue of this mountain of bonds. No $36,000,000,000 of money was applied to its development and enrichment. The bulk of the debt is the inheritance of a wasting, desolating war. Of the $1,300,000,000 State and local indebtedness it may be asserted with the grave assurance of truth that not fifty cents on the dollar was realized to the people who have the taxes to pay. The other half went into the pockets of the "ring men," or it was shamefully squandered upon unremunerative enterprises and corrupt jobbery. The General Government itself most wantonly, if not corruptly, paid an unconscionable percentage of its bond issues to syndicates and favored agents.

When, therefore, Mr. Chairman, a western man stands here who knows how the tax-gatherer year by year takes from the husbandman and laborer of his district his whole year's planting and harvesting and labor to pay the coupons on such bonds; when we tell you that while, in our judgment, the plain reading of the Constitution, interpreted by the light of the debates of its framers, recognizes gold and silver as the legal tender; when we concede that it is the traditional money of the democratic party and the money of value in the recognition of the commercial world—and we long for its day of stability among us—yet in the light of inexorable facts neither the patriotism nor the judgment of the West is to be challenged when we say that the power lodged in a single man, the Secretary of the Treasury, by the resumption act of January 14, 1875, authorizing him to issue additional gold-interest-bearing bonds to enable him to go into the markets of the world to buy at any price the gold requisite to execute that act by the 1st of January, 1879, is not only a dangerous power but, if arbitrarily exercised, would drive the people to despair, if not revolution.

Nothing so arouses the desperation of our nature as the dread of starvation at the hearth of our household. How many homilies are read us nowadays from certain quarters, on the necessity and propriety of maintaining our foreign credit. I sometimes feel like that proverbial wit of illustration, Patrick Malloy, who had just laid in a fat pig and a jug of the "O, be joyful" for "swate Christmas," when a friend called and announced the arrival in town of a relative from "Ould Ireland." Pat said "Dem his eyes, I don't want to see any furrin relations; theys always hungry and dry buggers." I could almost wish sometimes we had no foreign relations. They are a hungry set, crying for gold. We have public men and politicians in this country who seem to think that the whole financial policy of the country ought to be based on the enhancement of the value of our foreign-held obligations. It was this that in 1869 induced Congress to change the 5.20 bonds to gold bonds, thereby defrauding the people out of millions of money.

The first duty of an American Congressman is to the people of his own country. If there be one especial case where the maxim "Charity begins at home" could be applied with all consistency and propriety it is in our legislation. A government accredited abroad at the sacrifice of the home comforts and manhood of its own citizens is but a giant monster, which, while it commands the attention of the world, tramples down its own subjects, and in its very presence the spirit of true liberty pales and dies.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge KELLEY, said on this floor not long since that "the American people are patient asses." They certainly have been patient; but Josh Billings said he had known a mule to wait twenty years for a good chance to kick a man's brains out; and, if this disposition of the mule be inherited, may not his "illustrious ancestor" some day ere long turn his heels upon those who have been so severely testing his patience with burdens grievous to be borne and kick them out of time and place.

See what these people have borne. Since 1863 there have been collected from them by way of internal revenue, $2,086,590,703.88, and since the close of the war $1,928,441,762.43; customs receipts since the war, $1,910,445,897.25—making an aggregate paid by these people, directly and indirectly, into the public Treasury in the last ten years, $3,838,887,659.68. If we were to add to this the sums which the officials actually gathered from the people and stole, like one of Wilkie Collins's heroes, Captain Wrag, who, when he stole money from his employer, entered it in his private book account as a "self-presented testimonial of merit," the amount would exceed $4,000,000,000, nearly enough to have paid off the entire public debt if the Government had been frugally and honestly administered.

OUR EXCISE LAWS.

It is an instructive lesson suggestive of how far beyond all intendment of the founders of the Government we have traveled in these latter days to read Madison's discussion in the Federalist, (No. 45,) vindicating the Union against supposed danger to the State governments from its powers. He says:

> If the Federal Government is to have collectors of revenue the State government will have theirs also, and as those of the former will be principally on the sea-coast and not very numerous, while the latter will be spread over the face of the country and will be very numerous, the advantage in this view lies also on the same side. The eventual collection under the immediate authority of the Union will generally be made by the officers and according to the rules appointed by the several States.

He had no conception of the realities of this day, when the Federal officials permeate the whole domain of the States, thronging the highways and scouting the bypaths, overawing with the insolence of power the citizen and overshadowing and challenging to interference the authorities of the States. Under our excise laws a system of espionage and oppression has sprung up which is a disgrace to our civilization, and finds a parallel only in the revenue system enforced with such cruel and heartless exactness by the English upon the poor, helpless, fallen Scots.

Revenue exactions seem to have been especially aimed at the article of tobacco. It has been thought wise by those charged with devising ways and means for the Government to hedge in this product with such refinements and complications and to load it down with such burdens that the ordinary agriculturist cannot comprehend it or steer clear of its breakers or scarcely hazard its cultivation. Even those whose office it is to interpret and enforce it are often puzzled, and have no uniform system for its application. So the plain, honest, man whose study is how to plant and cultivate, when to cut and how to cure, is often amazed to find himself in the iron hands of a deputy United States marshal, and arraigned in the criminal's dock for the violation of a crude statute of which he is as ignorant as the subjects of Caligula were of the laws hung so high no one could see to read.

But too recently I saw arraigned in a United States court, under an indictment for manufacturing and selling tobacco without a license, an old man. On his head had fallen the frosts of more than threescore winters. He was an old settler. From the western slopes of the Alleghanies, over half a century ago, perhaps, he had caught the glimpses of that star of empire which beckoned him westward; and he heeded its invitation. With no fortune but a brave heart and a strong arm he penetrated the wilds of the western bank of the Mississippi, beat down the wild-brier and bull-nettle, and where not long before the smoke curled up from the Indian wigwam, he pitched his tent, felled the forest, and hewed out his humble home. Unambitious of the world's glory and its ignoble strifes, he sought alone that peace and happiness which spring from honest industry and a competency.

As had been his custom for many years, he planted a few acres of tobacco on this homestead where he had reared his family. To one of his neighbors he had sold fifty cents' worth of tobacco. Learning in a few days that he had violated a law of the United States statutes, like an honest man he went to his neighbor to make restitution. But the greedy eye of the lurking spy was on him, and he was arrested. When his case was called this venerable old man stepped inside the bar and with a voice and face every tone and lineament of which bespoke the truth more eloquently than the advocacy of any counsel, he told his plain, unvarnished story, which was corroborated by his neighbors. The judge looked upon him with a pitying eye; but the cold, unrelenting rigor of the revenue law was such that no mercy was there, and the verdict of guilty went upon the record.

This is but one of many such instances illustrative of a bad law and its worse enforcement, by which the little homes and their all are swept from the poor, unsuspecting, and uninformed. Let it be modified. Let there rest upon our public statutes no law that has not in it the elements of mercy and reason. Let us strike down in our whole revenue system the prize-money of the spy and informer, who are but sleuth-hounds to scent the heels and beset the homes of poor farmers and workingmen. This is not the game for which in our public enactments we should set the fowler's net. If one-half the vigilance displayed by these hirelings in hunting down, without discretion or humanity, honest men had been exhibited in other directions, the pampered parasites of the Government, who have rioted for years in palaces of splendor and luxury under the very eye of power on stolen money, would long since have adorned niches in a felon's cell, instead of the drawing-rooms and parlors of stilted society.

No higher evidence of the viciousness of the present internal-revenue system could be adduced than the fact that with four taxable articles the officers and employés for its enforcement number 3,734, exclusive of deputy collectors, at an expense in the last fiscal year of $5,606,000; penalties collected from the people under it amount to $331,933,000.02; the amount paid to informers, exclusive of moieties, is $231,317.94.

YANKEE SHREWDNESS.

Dr. Bull Run Russell, wishing to express delicately the corrupt habits of a certain prince of India, wrote: "He is a very able man with strong commercial tendencies which are developed to benefit his own interests." So the long dominant element in this Congress, possessing unquestioned ability, have legislated to benefit most their own interests.

In 1870 when a tax was imposed on incomes and salaries the amount of internal revenue collected from the different States was more nearly equal; but with its abolition the following table shows how the great bulk of this burden rests upon the South and West:

Amount of income paid in 1870 and 1875.

From the State of Missouri alone, with a population of about 2,000,000, there was collected in 1875 $4,594,875.31, while the whole six New England States, on an aggregate population of about 3,500,000, paid only $3,989,810.75, less by $605,046.02 than one western State.

SAVINGS INSTITUTIONS.

On the 18th day of June, 1874, an act of Congress was passed exempting from taxation all deposits in associations known as provident or savings institutions on sums not exceeding $2,000. This exemption is not confined, as under the law of 1866, to that class of institutions having no capital stock and doing no banking business, but is extended to those of like name having a capital stock and declaring dividends. Under the operation and cover of this law the six New England States in May, 1875, on an invested capital of $13,291,767, had a deposit account of $432,077,436, making an aggregate of $445,369,203, of which there was taxable only the sum of $70,625,228. The single State of Missouri had in such banks a capital of $9,226,683 and deposits $35,723,844, making an aggregate of $44,950,527, while her taxable sum for the same period was $48,192,328.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his late report shows that the average amount of capital held by these banks and bankers, not national, in May, 1875, was $200,316,008; that the average amount of their deposits in the same month was $1,346,014,813; the total of capital and deposits in the same month was $1,546,330,911. The amount of the taxable capital and deposits of these banks and bankers during said six months was only $780,494,076, or a little more than three-quarters of a million of dollars, while the amount of the actual capital and deposits of these same institutions was in round numbers $1,546,000,000. The Commissioner says:

> It will also be apparent from the table how unequally this taxation is distributed among the States. Thus upon a given amount of capital and deposits the tax on California as compared with Massachusetts is as ten to one, on Michigan as compared with the same State as sixteen to one, on Virginia as compared with Vermont as five to one. The city of New York, possessing of taxable capital and deposits $50,000,000 less than Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut combined, pays a tax three times as great as these States. While these same States, having capital and deposits three times as great as California, pay about one-half the tax thereon that is paid by California.

No wonder New England in the aggregate is so true to republicanism when republicanism is so true to her.

> 'Tis their duty, so all the learned think,
> To 'spouse the cause by which they eat and drink.

As she looks first at her bank account and then at her tax receipt, she might well exclaim, "Mutare vel timere sperno"—I scorn to change or to fear.

TARIFF.

Not content with all this, she joins hands with the Key-stone State and a few recruits scattered over other States, armed and equipped as they are with every offensive and defensive weapon, bright and gleaming with the burnish of syllogism, antithesis, and sophism, to bolster up and continue that relic of barbarism called a protective tariff, but which it will be hard to persuade a plain man, not a participant in its monopoly, is not a license to nine millions of people to rob thirty-one millions.

A half a century ago the argument of the high tariffites was that our American manufactures should be protected during the country's infancy, but when the country was maturer and its position among the commercial powers of the world was assured, then the fostering hand of the Government might be withdrawn. Well, this Republic is now one hundred years old—a rather tough old infant, and with teeth so sharp and keen as to make it a little unpleasant, I should think, for it to be tugging at the paps. But the Vulcan of the iron-works of Pennsylvania, Judge KELLEY, whose transcendent ability enables him to serve a bad cause as well as a good one, comes forth to forge a new argument to take the place of the old worn-out one. He argued on this floor not long since that when the Government was young, dependent, and undeveloped a free trade might be needful; but when it had grown into full manhood, and its mines and manufactures pervaded, then protection was an absolute necessity! Both of these arguments and theories cannot be true. And a plain, fair, free-thinking man will more than suspect that when the one has served its purpose, if it be at once abandoned for another, both are probably impudent shams and pregnant falsehoods.

A tariff for revenue may be tolerated as a sacrifice of individual interest for the maintenance of Government, but when its object goes beyond that to build up individual interests at the expense of the many, it is a perversion of the very objects of just Government and a travesty of democratic institutions whose chief element is equality of right.

> The highest right pertaining to property is the right to freely exchange it for other property.

When therefore, a farmer on his own homestead, with his own hands, raises more corn and wheat than he consumes, and under the privilege which is his goes to a foreign market with this surplus and exchanges it for what he needs most for home use, such as woolen cloth, that cloth is as much the product of his toil and sweat as though he had produced the raw material and fabricated the cloth; and when he is stopped on his return trip at our port of entry and told that he must pay a duty on this cloth of 50 per cent. for the purpose of protecting some home manufacturer, he can never be made to understand that it is a "blessing in disguise." When the poor mechanic or day laborer has worked hard all day for his one dollar or dollar and a half, and goes home to find his little ones shaking and burning with malarial fever, and he must go to a druggist and pay $2.20 for an ounce of sulphate of quinine instead of $1.56, only because two companies in the State of Pennsylvania are engaged in its manufacture, he can never be made to feel happy and content as he returns home to sit with supperless stomach chewing the cud of Judge KELLEY's philosophy on the blessings of a tariff to the poor man. Doubtless if the judge's constituents had had erected near by a butcher-stall when it rained meat over in Kentucky, he would have cited precedent and "drawn the thread of his verbosity" for the establishment of a port of entry for foreign meat in Bath County! This phenomonal shower undoubtedly did interfere with "home industries," for it is said that every "mother's son" of the fifteenth amendment quit all manner of work and sat down to rejoice, and sang—

> I tells you, niggah, once for sho',
> Dis chile work neber any mo';
> For you kin jes look to the groun',
> Where de Lord frows de mutton down.

Journals like the Bulletin belabor us with essays to prove that protection cheapens the price of commodities. If its tendency be to reduce prices to a starveling grade, why is it that the manufacturer clamors for its continuance? If there be one characteristic of the American more conspicuous than another, it is that he does not expend his energy and talent willingly except in the line of his personal aggrandizement. If a duty of 25 per cent. should cheapen the commodity in the same ratio by the argumentum ad absurdam, a duty of 100 per cent. ought, upon the same parity of reasoning, to make it sell for nothing. And if protection so modifies the price of the commodity, where is the manufacturer's profit? And why does he contend for a system that promotes competition and low prices? Surely in all the years since 1842, if the tariff alone reduced prices, Congress had not been beset by the protected classes for its continuance. If, notwithstanding the duties imposed on every article imported from abroad, the importers can yet enter into competition with our home manufacturers reducing the prices owing to the abundance of foreign material, the cheapness of labor, improved mechanism, and skilled labor, combined with like causes at home, what might we not witness if the embargo of impost duties were removed? If it be true that a high tariff be essential to protect the life of our industrial interests against European pauper labor and superabundant material, it is a curious process of ratiocination by which it is explained how our manufacturers of calico and other articles are boasting of becoming exporters and selling in the markets of Europe.

Beyond all question protection possesses a reducing power in a given direction. If any one doubts it let him look into the statistics of

OUR AMERICAN SHIPPING.

In 1860, before the present tariff system, the heart of every American citizen beat high with patriotic emotion as he went upon the high seas and wherever his eye turned beheld our flag streaming from the masthead of every ship floating our commerce. Then the tonnage of our vessels entered and cleared with cargoes at our ports from and to foreign countries was 12,086,209, while the tonnage of the foreign vessels was 4,977,916. But to-day our flag has almost disappeared from the seas. In the fiscal year just passed the tonnage of American vessels had shrunk to 7,310,589, while that of the foreign vessels had increased to 16,278,728; so that, while ours has fallen in these fifteen years 40 per cent., the foreign vessels have increased 250 per cent. The protectionists say the reason for this is that "our capital finds more remunerative employment in some other business." Pray tell me where is that remunerative business?

In the year just closed there have been eight thousand prominent failures in business with the spectacle of half a dozen States in default on their interest, unable to meet their obligations. Paralysis seems to have seized all enterprise; pauperism is crowding our almshouses and driving virtue mad with squalor; the ruthless plowshare of social caste, worse than feudalism, is plowing its way through the land, while on either side of the widening chasm are to be seen our debtor and creditor classes, the one gaunt with famine and mute with despair, the other plethoric with bonds, eager with greed and clamorous for immediate resumption and more protection. And though our western fields bloom and groan under loads of golden grain, and the cotton-fields of the South wave as if all Dixie floated with white banners, tokens of peace to the country, yet all is gathered and turned over to the tax-gatherer and to monopolizing tariffs. The truth is the money wrapped up in bonds and in the so-called provident banks is hid away from assessors, so that the whole burdens of government fall upon landed estates, personal property, and the industrial interests of the country. This it is that makes capital timid. This it is in part that hoards money in banks. It skulks from the tax-gatherer. It shrinks from investments in property the value of which no economist can foretell a year. Protection on lumber and iron and all the materials of construction has hushed the din of busy industry in our ship-building docks and made the shores of England resonant with the cheerful hum of the employed artisan and mechanic.

Publicists and financiers may read us essays on the laws of nations and trade until our ears are tired with the monotony of their maxims; but the plain road after all is that taken by the Committees on Appropriations and Ways and Means to bring at least moderate relief to the people of this country. The one checking the lavish expenditure of public money, breaking down the idea that the governmental departments are a sort of eleemosynary institutions for the support of political "dead beats," our diplomatic service fat places for partisan parasites who beset the Federal board for crumbs and honors, administering the Government on the broad idea of frugality without parsimony, efficiency without prodigality; the other recognizing the necessity of a large yielding revenue system to meet the country's indebtedness, yet laboring to restrict our excise and custom laws to a revenue basis, thus unloosing the iron grasp of tariff monopolies, allowing other industrial interests a breathing-spell, and inspiring the producers and laborers to look beyond the scanty confines of their present paltry fortunes to a day when he who sows shall reap and he who plants shall eat the fruit of his labor.

The American Congress, in view of the weight of debt on the people, have one plain, unfaltering duty before them, to see that it is not increased. No maudlin sentimentality nor that spasmodic, emotional, gushing philanthropy and patriotism which somehow seizes all parties on the eve of a presidential election should betray us into bequests of millions on millions more of money that must be wrung like teeth or drawn like blood from a suffering, struggling people. Extravagance and corruption have filled the whole land with a plenteous harvest of "pious prostitution and reverend rascality." Severe and solemn is the duty of the hour which demands that we should bring back the country to that condition of public virtue in which we shall have patriotism for partisanism, liberty with law, and government without oppression.

Mr. HOUSE obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, under the order made this morning, the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDEE. Before offering the resolution in relation to the acceptance of the statue of Ethan Allen, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FREEMAN.]

TARIFF.

Mr. FREEMAN addressed the House on the bill in relation to the tariff reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

FINANCE.

Mr. HENDEE. I now yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, the most absorbing and important political issue of the day, excepting the condition of the South and the purposes of her leaders, is the industral and financial condition of the whole country.

As in all confused discussion of questions, the determination of which is within the limit of human powers and required by human necessities, so in this, one of the chief difficulties arises from the fact that fundamental truths are overlooked or ignored, and the combatants strike wildly at phantoms in the air, false theories and issues abound, and secondary questions are elevated into undue importance, when careful examination of elementary principles and reflection upon them, until they are clearly comprehended, would lead all sound minds to the same conclusions.

I conceive that the real contest now raging in this country is not between those who differ as to the when and the how of returning to specie payments—that is, to coined property as the best visible representative of abstract value, and its most accurate and unvarying measure in contracts and exchanges—but between all who believe that value requires a concrete measure, in order that mankind may transact the business of life, a belief which is a part of the soul, an innate idea clearer than an axiom, and illustrated by the spontaneous and necessary practice of the human race in all ages, both in the barbarous and in the civilized states, under all forms and under no forms of government, because independent of and more necessary than any government to the existence of men, is a material standard of value, which in itself posseses value as a commodity; and those, on the other hand, who deny totally this theory of all time, and claim that real money is not intrinsically property, but a mere token or sign, endowed with power to cancel debts by positive law, which enforces its mandate by denying further remedy in the courts. In other words, it is a dispute as to the real nature and uses of money and of exchange.

PRIMARY TRUTHS.

I beg pardon for calling attention to a few primary truths. First, to the universal law of labor. Compliance with this law alone creates value. Labor is that which confers values. Without it few commodities would exist at all, and those which did would lack essential worth; and the relative value of all depends upon the quality and amount of intellectual and manual labor bestowed upon them. Kindly nature furnishes the clay and straw, but we must apply labor or starve. Skill results from practice, and hence every man devotes himself to the production of some particular thing and not of everything in general. This is the division of labor.

Again, resulting from compliance with this universal law and the further truth that labor belongs to the laborer, because man is not a slave, is the essential and inalienable right of every man to the ownership of that which his labor has produced and to dispose of it as his inclination or wants require. Now the primal wants of mankind are food, clothing, and protection from the elements. These are in the highest sense necessaries, for without them life cannot exist; and there is a great diversity of employments and productions for the purpose of supplying these wants. And as no man has produced or can produce all that is necessary to enable him to live, men must exchange the produce of their industries. Here lies the fundamental idea of convertibility. It is found imperfectly in exchange by barter, that is, the exchange of articles which have no common measure of value, and which are the immediate objects of desire between the parties; as, for instance, when a farmer desires to exchange the produce of his fields with the manufacturer of cloths who is in want of food. The inequality of the relative value of the things to be exchanged compelled the invention of money. I refer to real money, which is property, and not a creation of government; gold and silver being universally used as such by civilized people, because they have the quality of absolute convertibility among all nations. That is, a man having any kind of property can convert it into gold and silver, and that silver or gold will buy any property whatever in any country. But we should not lose sight of the fact that it is an exchange of properties just as much as where men swap horses or oxen or farms. In every honest trade or sale ever made there was, or was designed to be, an exchange of values, which had been produced by equivalent amounts of labor at some time applied to the commodities exchanged. If a horse is exchanged for $100 dollars in gold, then if the sale is a fair and just sale, the average cost of producing and training horses of like quality is just the same as the cost of producing $100 in gold coin.

Gold and silver are selected as the commodities which shall be used as the measures of values, because of their great worth in small bulk, their scarcity requiring protracted labor to obtain them, their durability, malleability, and beauty, which render them desirable in the arts, for personal ornaments, and many other uses, all combining to give these metals uniformity of value and especially as money.

Now these precious metals do not cease to be property because they are converted into money, nor is the act of Government coinage necessary to make them money. Government can make them legal tender, and thus increase somewhat their usefulness; but they are money by virtue of their own nature and the universal assent and sanction of mankind.

A piece of gold is worth as much before coinage as afterward, less the charge of the Mint. Even if demonetized by act of government—that is, deprived of its quality as a legal tender—it will still continue in use somewhere among mankind as money, simply because it is made money by virtue of its own nature and its adaptation to the necessities of society. Thus it is apparent that real money may be defined as that form of property which is by its own intrinsic qualities adapted to facilitate the exchange of commodities in general, and therefore, by consent of mankind, applied to that use.

CREDIT.

But it is found by experience that credits must exist in the very nature of things.

Capital is a very broad term, and in one sense it embraces all the factors of production, land, implements, muscle, brain, in short all the elements of power applied to the creation of property. But the ownership of capital is often in the aged, the sick, the retired, the incompetent, in those who lack either the capacity or disposition to use it, while, on the other hand, those possessing capacity, endurance, and enterprise lack the accumulated wealth or capital which is the necessary foundation of business. These parties meet. It is natural and often indispensable for us to put faith in each other; it is generally kept. Here, then, is the foundation of credit, which is the transfer of an actual property for a promise or an act of the mind.

Now all that gives value to the promise when it is used as a medium of sale or exchange is confidence that it will be performed. Another promise replacing the first is not performance, although, if confidence, which is a state of the mind, remains unshaken, the credit may be extended by the substitution of the new promise for the old one. But it is apparent that the promise must some time be kept by an actual payment or redemption in actual property for that originally received, otherwise the creditor or his assignee is wronged and confidence, the basis of all credit, must disappear. Contracts are not always kept, and disputes arise as to their obligation; hence society establishes courts of justice, and these fortify our faith in each other by compelling performance, and thus serve as a most essential basis of credit. The judgments of courts must be paid, not in promises, but in property, if it can be found from which to obtain satisfaction. And here again arises a new necessity for the existence of money, or fixed measure of value known to the civil law, in which its decree may be intelligibly expressed and by which it can be satisfied, which measure of value is called legal tender. This should of course be and, when things are in their normal state, is gold or silver, the money of the world. Sometimes temporarily a nation is obliged to substitute for its own indebtedness and that of its citizens a promise to pay, instead of an actual commodity, as a legal tender, as, for instance, the greenback for coin. The greenback is a promise. Like that of an individual, its value depends wholly upon its being performed—paid; and it is only in that faith that it circulates among the people. The act of Government making it legal tender cannot give a permanent value to it. Replacing it with a new promise, whether a bond or otherwise, will give it no more value. Nothing but payment or belief in payment can give a permanent value to a promise. Payment in lies is poor stuff, no matter who tells them.

I trust the House will pardon me for the liberty I have taken in calling attention to these, as they appear to me to be, self-evident truths, because they are directly contravened by the teachings of able men upon this floor and throughout the land—teachings which, although they may be popular for a time, are in my judgment of pernicious effect upon the business and honesty of the country; and I beg leave to examine more closely the doctrines of the advocates of a paper currency not redeemable in coin.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF FINANCE.

"The American system of finance," so called, is to my apprehension substantially the same, whether expounded by the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania or by the subtle and analytical intellect of the gentleman from Illinois, or by Mr. Britton A. Hill or General Butler in their able expositions of their views of the principles of finance and the proper application of those principles to the affairs of this country.

The substance of all their theories is, first, the abolition of property in any form as a medium of exchange and circulation, and, second, the substitution therefor of some cheap material, which, being stamped with a mark or inscription by which it may be identified and being made a tender by law for the satisfaction of debts both public and private, shall be money, and, by force of the statutes of the land, the only real money of the American people. Gold and silver will be demonetized, and will continue to exist only as wheat, corn, horses, houses, and lands exist; that is, in the form of commodities. They could still be bought and sold, and by common consent could still remain in use as money; but they would not be money. Their transfer from hand to hand would be mere barter or exchange.

Now, under the system of finance which has thus far obtained upon earth, it will be observed, as already shown, that whenever men trade with each other, if there is any difference in the values of the properties exchanged to be adjusted, that difference is paid in actual money, which is just as much property as potatoes, iron, or tin, or that a credit is given for the balance that may be due; that is, a promise to pay it is accepted instead of the actual delivery of property at the moment of the principal transaction. The credit is simply payment deferred. Thus each party gets an equivalent value in property or in a promise, the performance of which is relied upon, and is therefore treated as property. But this new system abolishes both property and promise from the legal-tender circulation of the country. It substitutes for them an act of law compelling the creditor to receive a thing worthless in itself, having no substantial value except what lies in the law making it a legal tender. The new legal tender is to be no promise to pay, nor is it to be a commodity having any value in itself except what lies in the fact that the creditor is compelled to receive it or lose his claim absolutely. It is the same as to say that one grain of corn shall be legal tender for a farm, two grains of corn for two farms. Chips, shells, paper, bits of tin, iron, silver, copper, zinc, or gold, or any other substance capable of being marked or of receiving a durable impression can be made money by act of law, having a paying power according to the amount which the law shall prescribe without regard to the value of the thing selected to perform this function as a commodity.

A piece of silver which is now of the value of $1 could be made legal tender for one hundred or one thousand; a five-dollar gold piece could by law be transformed into one or ten thousand dollars by act of Congress, while a bit of tin no larger than the ear of a mouse could be made a legal tender in full satisfaction of a debt of millions of dollars actual value in the coin currency of the world, according to the astonishing pretentions of this "new national system of finance," as it is reverently called by its advocates. It is better than the miracle of the alchemist performed. It does not, for it needs not, transmute anything into gold: for gold as money is no better than brass. It does better. It creates out of nothing, and, if made universal, would enable one of our enterprising Yankees, if he could get trusted for the universe, to pay for it with a wormy wooden nutmeg, provided it had received the Government stamp.

That I state the position of the advocates of paper currency, irredeemable in any kind of commodity by the Government correctly will be seen from the following extract from the speech of Hon. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, delivered on this floor January 29, 1876:

> Money is a legalized agent, invented to facilitate the exchanges of property and products and to pay debts. To be fitted for the performance of these functions it must have uniform credit and equal legal powers in the payment of debts throughout the jurisdiction of the government instituting it and putting it into circulation. These properties or powers are imparted to it by the law making it a tender in the payment of debts, and are in no degree dependent upon the quantity or quality of the material by which they are expressed. The only thing that gives one substance the preference over another for the material of money is its superior convenience. It has no material value but only an immaterial or legal value.

And again, in Hill upon Absolute Money, page 47, the author says:

> This national money should not have any intrinsic value whatever, nor should it bear the character of a "promise to pay," since in either case it would become a purchasable commodity, and the money of the nation must not be purchasable.

In his address before the New York Board of Trade, delivered October 14, 1875, Hon. Benjamin F. Butler says, page 19:

> Third. I want that dollar—

Speaking of the dollar which he would introduce in his system of finance—> stamped upon some convenient and cheap material of the least possible intrinsic value, so that neither its wear nor its destruction will be any loss to the Government issuing it.

> Fourth. I also desire that the dollar be made of such material, for the purpose that it shall never be exported or desirable to carry out of the country. Framing an American system of finance, I do not propose to adapt it to the wants of any other nation, and especially the Chinese, who are nearly one-quarter of the world.
> Fifth. I desire that the dollar so issued shall never be redeemed. I see no more reason why the unit of measure of value should be redeemed or redeemable than the yard-stick with which I measure my cloth or the quart with which I measure my milk should be redeemed.

This issue, then, is fundamental. It must be settled. Here, sir, is the pivot upon which turns the whole financial question now agitating the country, and there never can be real business prosperity until the people have thought this thing through and out.

The advocates of the present financial system of this and of all nations assert that money is tangible property, the equal in value of that for which it is exchanged, and that where paper is a substitute for money it contains the promise of such value to be paid in true money on the part of the source of issue; and the confidence that such promise will be kept is all that gives permanent value and currency to any kind of paper or promissory circulation.

They assert that the proposed elimination of the promise of the Government to pay will destroy the value of any paper money which the American or any other government can issue. On the other hand, the advocates of absolute money deny this and claim that the promise is unnecessary, and the Government stamp and compulsory laws making paper legal tender for debts will make the paper the same or better than coin for all monetary purposes.

WHICH IS RIGHT?

Which is right? The answer to this question settles the whole discussion. Now, it is idle to say that Government has not the physical power to create a new legal tender, out of any substance or out of no substance whatever, for existing debts. It can abolish the courts and all legal remedies. It can repudiate its own obligations and decree universal liquidation of all debts, both public and private. The nation, by constitutional or other legislation, can prohibit the contraction or payment of any indebtedness whatever; that is, the power resides in sovereignty to confiscate all property of the citizen. But the question is not as to its power, but as to its right to destroy. I assert that the creation of a legal tender which the creditor is bound to accept in satisfaction of his debt, which tender is neither actual property having dimensions and salable value in the market and money of the world, of the same nominal and real worth as his demand, nor the promise of Government, nor of a bank, nor of any other party whose promise the law does not make equivalent to performance, is repudiation and confiscation, and nothing else. The creditor may be thus robbed of his existing debt contracted in good faith upon a promise to pay, but the operation will stop there. No man can be persuaded again to part with his property on trust. He will resort to barter, excepting so far as he relies for payment upon the force of honor, and credit will forever cease among men.

It is no reply to say that the greenback is a promise not redeemed, but is still accepted as a measure of value and medium of exchange, though fluctuating and far below the value of gold. Nothing gives the greenback the least value to tempt men into new commercial transactions but the belief that it will be paid. It is simply a broken promise, not bearing interest. The fact that the time when it will be paid is unknown depreciates but does not destroy its value, because there is still faith in the promise of the Government; and meanwhile it is available as a legal tender to discharge existing debts. It is true also that the fact that it bears no interest causes less depreciation than in case of an ordinary debt, the time of payment of which is uncertain and which bears no interest, for the legal-tender quality of the greenback keeps it in constant circulation. No man possesses a given bill longer than he is obliged to. He pays it out to cancel an interest-bearing debt which he owes, or lends it to some one who will pay him interest, and who in his turn cancels a debt, or engages in business with it as capital, the profits upon which he hopes will be more than equivalent to the rate he pays for its use. Thus, although payment is deferred, yet the ability and intention of the promisor to pay is not questioned, and there is but small depreciation of the Government promise; and whenever the time of payment is made certain, and is so nearly reached that the greenback can be profitably held as an investment, for the margin between its existing value and coin it is sure to be hoarded for the sake of this interest and gradually to appreciate to par value with coin, regardless of the amount of bills to be redeemed. Satisfy the holder of the greenback that he will be paid in gold dollar for dollar at a fixed time, and every one of them will be already funded except what the demands of the country keep in circulation as a medium of exchange.

But it is wholly incorrect to draw the inference, as the advocates of the "great American system" do, because the dishonored promise of the Government still floats that mere paper would do so, and I reiterate what I have already said to show why it cannot and the crime it would be to make the attempt. Every sale, or exchange, or commercial transaction whatever is an exchange of property or values supposed and agreed by the parties to be equal. It is so in the nature of things. It can be nothing else. Legislation is powerless to make it anything else. It would be an exchange of equal supposed values if there were no civil government whatever and a legal tender was impossible. The civil law can create nothing. It merely facilitates a transaction which would still be necessary and would still be the same if civil laws and courts for the enforcement of obligations were unknown. A sale or exchange is the same whether perfected among savage tribes or among civilized nations with laws prescribing a legal tender and courts to vindicate the sanctity of contracts, and will remain unchanged in the great millennial future when the machinery of government shall be abolished by the moral and intellectual perfection of the race. Individual men always have made and forever will make their agreements, and from the nature of man it will always be the case that each party will endeavor to get in property the equivalent of that with which he parts, both articles being measured by comparison with each other or by some common standard or measure of value. It is always the same, whether it be an exchange of similar or diverse articles, or miscellaneous commodities, or for that commodity known from the nature of its uses as money. The man who sells his horse for $100 may just as properly be said to purchase the money as to sell the horse; one article is bought and sold just as much as the other; and this relation of buyer and seller is the only essential one known in commercial affairs. All other relations and agencies, the laws, customs, and rules of trade, banks and bank bills, commercial paper, coinage or governmental authentication of money or paper promises to pay, the courts, and all other machinery of commercial transactions, are only subordinate and concomitant facilities for the performance of that which, if none of these things existed, would otherwise be performed, though with greater labor and embarrassment, and imperfectly at the best.

Labor and the adaptation of the thing upon which it is expended to the uses of man alone giving value, the Government can do it only incidentally in the way of protection against violence and fraud. The law can no more create a dollar in value than it can make a horse or a watch. It cannot give exchangeable value at all. It may arbitrarily regulate, although it has no right to, but it cannot create property. It has no right to interfere with property at all, except in furtherance of the general purposes for which governments are instituted among men, of which the protection, and not the arbitrary destruction, of the right of property is one of the chief. Now, when the Government steps in, and finding the relation of debtor and creditor universally existing among the people, says that wood or tin or paper shall be dollars, and that the tender of these worthless tokens shall extinguish debts, it simply confiscates by force. It utterly destroys that inalienable right of property which all just government is organized to protect, and becomes the robber of every creditor in the nation, and of every man who is not already insolvent; for every claim will be canceled by the same act.

Then, with confidence destroyed, who would trust his fellow-man or his country again, to be paid in nothing? It would drive society at once to the manual exchange of commodities, and contracts payable only in specific articles. And how easy for an unwilling debtor to divest himself of the specific article long before execution could be obtained by the tedious processes of the courts, and which must be satisfied in the specific article which the contract called for, because the legal tender of the country would be worthless. Commercial paper and bank currency would be utterly destroyed, because neither can exist unless convertible by law and by decree and execution of the courts into some legal tender having value as, or payable in, a commodity. Property would be destroyed, society would be reduced to barbarism, and ultimately the country would be depopulated, or rather, realizing at once the enormous villainy of the deed, the whole nation would rise and crush its perpetrators, re-establish honest government, and restore to circulation as the standard measure of values the honest dollar of our fathers.

DEALINGS WITH FOREIGN NATIONS.

Besides, even if a currency which is neither property itself nor a promise to pay property could be made to circulate in our own country by reason of the fact that people must buy and sell, and that whatever will pay debts will have some value for that reason alone—an aspect of the subject to which I will call attention hereafter—how could our transactions with foreign nations be carried on? We should have no use for gold at home, except as an article of merchandise. We should require it for exportation as a commodity; but the demand for it as coin, as well as a commodity, in all the rest of the world would cause its constant exportation, whether the balance of trade was for or against us. The country would be emptied of its precious metals as fast as they were dug from the eternal mountains. What should we do, then, if the markets of Europe were closed against us by the chances of war, by foreign tariffs, or other causes which might prevent us from selling our commodities abroad, and thus obtaining those productions of other lands which are indispensable to the comfort and happiness of our people, and the possession of which constitutes a not inconsiderable part of the enjoyment of civilized life? How in case of insufficient production within our own borders, where we must buy or starve, and we have no gold, the money of the world, to sell?

The balance of trade against us, wherewith should we pay the interest and principal of that portion of our national debt now owned abroad? That, however, would probably be extinguished in the original act of confiscation, by virtue of which this vaunted system of finance is to be introduced. Grant, contrary to the fact, that in time of peace, so long as the balance of trade is in our favor, we should not export coin; but the time now is and must long continue, and in the exigencies of national life will often return, when the balance of trade will be against us. What then can we do without coin, or paper which promises coin and is convertible into coin by law and in fact? Accidents of climate and a thousand causes may deprive us of exportable commodities. Suppose, as is sure to be the case, that in the centuries to come we are involved in wars with the empire silently consolidating on our northern border, or with Mexico, with island confederations, or among ourselves; suppose that our mining regions are wrested from us and the existence of the Government seriously threatened, or that for any cause the immediate necessity for the precious metals, to enable us to purchase abroad the means of warfare, should become indispensable to the existence of the American nation; how would you get them with no credit, no coin in the country, and with nothing to export? Would your worthless tender avail at such a crisis, when delay would be destruction? Would you not then require either coin or credit—either the world's money or a market for your national promises, your bonds, payable in the money of the world at a future day? But perpetrate one such act of repudiation as is the very corner-stone of this vaunted "American monetary system," and the American flag would not sell for ten cents in coin, and the Government could not borrow enough on its bond to pay the disgusted Irishman who, in his generosity, might fill up its dishonored, self-dug grave.

No civilized nation can segregate itself from the rest of mankind and remain civilized. God has made of one flesh all the nations of the earth. Commercially there is but one nation, and this truth is inexorable. That only is money which all commercial mankind recognizes as such. Political edicts may transiently interfere with nature, by establishing a legal tender which is not universal money, nor convertible into it by the holder, but the ruin which follows demonstrates the truth of the main proposition.

Urgent political necessity may override business necessity, and compel this to be done, as was the case in our country, but there is no other excuse. All that a nation has it will give for its life. Unless justified by such necessity it is a crime, and when, for such cause, an inconvertible legal tender exists, there is no possible extrication from industrial ruin but in a steady return to the money of the world and compliance with the laws of trade.

THE LEGAL-TENDER QUALITY.

But it is said that the proposed currency would have value, because being a tender for all debts, public and private, it would pay taxes. But what could Government do with the stuff? Having once repudiated its debts by issuing such a currency, who would voluntarily become its hired servant or its creditor again? Why, if such a currency is valuable without payment immediate or remote, should taxes be levied at all? Why not print more of it and abolish taxation, thus saving the dear people that burden which Franklin said was the only thing certain to the lot of humanity but death?

Let us apply this theory to the present condition of the country.

The national debt, including greenbacks, is about	$2,200,000,000
The sum total of all debts, State, county, municipal, and personal, has been estimated at	13,000,000,000
Making in round numbers about	15,000,000,000

It is proposed to pay this and do the business of the country with mere paper tokens, which are neither commodities, nor money, nor the promise to pay money. When, then, shall the system be introduced? If now, I propose to show that it is bald repudiation; if after payment of the national debt, that it is and will be irrelevant for many years and could never be introduced at all. By existing law, which cannot be avoided without a breach of public faith already pledged most solemnly both at home and abroad, the entire public debt is payable both principal and interest in coin. Now, if the public faith is kept, the whole problem will have been already solved, the country will have already discharged its obligations on a coin basis and will be free from debt. I take it that, whatever theorists might desire, if we should be able once more to place our currency and our business upon a specie basis all the powers and persuasion of this world would fail to delude the American people from their fast anchorage to coin as a measure of value. And if this "American system" of finance is only designed for introduction after the resumption of specie payments, and the national debt is paid, according to the contract between the country and its creditors, it is only an ignis fatuus, wholly irrelevant to the discussion of our present difficulties, and it is a matter of indifference to the American people whether this system might or might not work well in Utopia, or even on earth under conditions which do not and for generations cannot exist in this country, or whether it is a mere vision, or the dream of a poet, a philosopher, or an ass. No; it is idle to say that the advocates of this system mean to pay the debts or the interest on them in coin. Their remedy is designed to relieve the people of their debts by application to the present situation. The first step is indicated in the pending bill, sections 9 to 11 inclusive, and on page 6 of Mr. CAMPBELL'S speech, before quoted, as follows:

> Sections 9 to 11 inclusive provide for the issue of Treasury certificates in payment of the debts and current expenses of the Government, which certificates shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, (except when it is provided that payment shall be made in coin,) and interconvertible at the option of the holder with registered Government bonds, bearing such equitable rate of interest as will distribute property and products to labor and capital according to the labor or service performed in production.

Now, these Treasury certificates or tokens are never to be paid, for they are not promises to pay. They are merely pieces of paper of convenient form and suitable texture for circulation, labeled with figures indicating that the Government has received value for them, and the amount of value which the creditor must give up when they are tendered to him. There will thus be thrown upon the country $2,200,000,000 of these certificates, unless we repudiate the $700,000,000 owned abroad, without any juggling ceremony whatever. The national-bank system and currency will be annihilated, because the national bonds which are their basis will be sequestrated. The greenback will be canceled. The country will then be left with no circulating medium whatever save these $2,200,000,000 of nothing—absolutely nothing but so much paper material, clothed arbitrarily by law with the power of extinguishing debts when tendered for that purpose. It will be of no earthly value except to pay debts, and those who thus receive it from this paternal Government can do nothing at all with it except to pay their own debts, as they have themselves been paid, or lend it to borrowers who desire to get it for the same purpose.

The amount of national-bank notes and of greenbacks, including fractional currency, is $762,000,000; and this sum stands to-day at not more than eighty-eight cents on a dollar in gold, and much of this is not required by the business of the country. There is in actual circulation among the people to-day only $532,000,000. Of the remainder $60,000,000 is in the Treasury and $170,128,699 is lying in the banks. If now for these $762,000,000 of unpaid promises we substitute three times that amount—that is, the whole national debt—of token legal-tenders, which are never to be paid, what will be the effect upon the dollar or circulating medium of the country? There will be more than three where there is now one worth eighty-eight cents in gold; and if the new currency was an unredeemed promise to pay a dollar in gold, instead of no promise at all, even then the inevitable effect would be to liquidate every debt in the country at less than thirty cents on a dollar. But these Treasury certificates are not to be payable—that is, redeemable—at all in anything, and as soon as they have once served their purpose of confiscating the debts of the country and have destroyed the existing relations of debtor and creditor and ruined America forever, I would like to ask any sane man to give a reason why these billets of death will be worth anything at all.

It is no reply to this inexorable destiny to say that the "system" contemplates the convertibility of this trash into the form of a bond with principal and interest payable in the same trash. Nor is it of any use to endeavor to escape the conclusion that this currency would be worthless by saying that only so much as might be necessary to perform the business of the country would be issued. Such is not the theory itself, but sometimes its advocates take to this subterfuge when driven to the wall. France is said to have $33 of currency per capita. We have 44,000,000 of people, and at the same rate require $1,452,000,000. But, it is said, we are far more active as a people, our industries more diversified, and our population spread over a territory as large as all Europe, so that we absolutely require more than $2,000,000,000 of circulation, which, strangely enough, by this ingenious reasoning, amounts to just about the same as the national debt, which it is so much easier to repudiate than to pay.

DEPRECIATION.

But suppose that only $700,000,000 of this robber currency should be issued, and that we should try to do the business of the country upon it and never pay the currency itself. The Government, however, will receive it for taxes, and of course pay it out to pensioners and public servants, and for all running expenses. Would or would not this currency depreciate? How can you make the people believe that a currency is good for anything when you tell them at the same time that it will never be paid? Surely legal-tender currency which the Government promises to pay in coin is no worse because of the promise of the Government. Divest your present legal tender of the promise of the Government, and it remains just what you propose to issue. If now the present legal tender is so far depreciated, and, as all concede, has played such fantastic and ruinous tricks with trade and business in the past, how is it possible to expect the new legal tender to approximate the standard value of gold, affording a safe and steady measure of value for the business of this country and ultimately of the world? No, it is self-evident that the new currency would not appreciate above the value of the greenback; and such is the constitution of the human mind that ordinary mortals will consider the solemn promise of a great, honorable, and wealthy nation to pay its honest debts as worth something. Repudiation, or the elimination of that promise from the new currency, will depreciate its value (if it should have any) somewhat at the outset, and you would be absolutely obliged to replace that depeciation with a still further issue, which would increase the evil like a salt-fish diet in the desert.

Next, having once paid and cheated the public servants, by putting upon them a currency which will not enable them to live in your employ, you must raise their salaries and increase taxes for the defrayment of all the expenses of government. And then there is the interest on the public debt, foreign and domestic, payable in coin, for I am now supposing that you merely replace the national-bank bills and greenbacks with your new tender; your tariff dues, as well as internal revenues, under this new order of things are to be payable in this depreciated and depreciating token tender, and with it you must buy your gold, already banished by your new "system" from the American market. You will have to increase the issue on that account. Thus from year to year taxes would inevitably increase, more paper tokens would have to be issued as long as any one would receive them. Pensioners would be robbed, at first partially, in the end utterly. The public service would be destroyed. As the Government would have no power to collect taxes in anything but this paper folly, it could get nothing wherewith to make purchases in foreign markets in any of the great exigencies of peace or war when the possession of or power to get coin by taxation would be indispensable to the existence of the nation. Under such a system of finance this country would require nothing further than a mule-skin for a winding-sheet and room enough on the back door of a mad-house to write its appropriate epitaph. It demands no reach of intelligence to see that the abandonment of the right to levy and collect taxes in coin—that is, in actual property—is the abandonment of the right of taxation itself. If taxes cannot be collected in that which the world will accept as money we are no longer a nation, and the further application of this delusion by the heavily-burdened governments of the States would effectually extinguish their local sovereignty and at once dissolve all forms of civil government in the land. There would be no remedy but instant revolution.

I have not dwelt upon the miseries which would be inflicted upon the people at large by the continual and unavoidable depreciation of any legal tender not redeemable in actual property, either gold or other commodities. The bitter experience of this generation, even with a currency redeemable in coin, but upon which payment has been deferred, without, however, shaking the confidence of the people in the ultimate performance of the national pledge, ought to be a sufficient suggestion of the ten thousand times greater calamities which would follow such a deed of ill-designed repudiation as this scheme proposes to the American people. If the evils of a depreciated and irredeemed paper legal tender adopted under compulsion of war are not already sufficiently patent and destructive to warn us from the adoption of a system infinitely worse, having all the elements of calamity and dishonor which the financiers of the infernal regions could devise for us, it is useless for my feeble powers to attempt the impossible task.

There is reason to think that the gentlemen who have devised and advocated this system of so-called "finance" are misled in their judgment as to the magnitude of the financial evils which surround us and do not sufficiently realize the immense powers of payment and recuperation with which we have been endowed by a bountiful and benign Providence; and in their desperation, born of deep sympathy for the great prostration of business interests in some portions of the country, they have been tempted to seek escape from honest obligations at the expense of good faith, not designing, however, to recommend to the people a dishonest deed. They have really made themselves believe that this system could, by its magic and mystery, perform the impossible thing; and what wonder then if large numbers of men, to whom the study of finance is unknown, have embraced their plausible and comforting theories?

I devoutly wish that I could believe and act with them. I, too, am largely a debtor, and, if possible to see hope in their views, I should sleep far better o' nights myself. But I do not think that a disposition to exaggerate and overbewail the difficulties of the situation is beneficial or justifiable, and hence I feel called upon to pay some attention to doctrines upon the subject of advanced by the honorable gentleman from Illinois. If his views are correct, it is an absolute impossibility for the business of the country to go on upon any system of finance. He informs us that the increase of property is not over 3 per cent. per year, and proves it by the statistics of the census. I will not contradict his premises, since I am not aware of the existence of reliable data to the contrary. He says that the average rate of interest paid in the country is not less than 8 per cent., which estimate is none too high. I also agree with him that, in my judgment, this is more than it ought to be, and that the true interests of borrower and lender would be promoted by a large reduction of the rate. I further agree that there now exists a large mass of contracts in all parts of the country, and probably this is particularly true of some portions of the West, where the inevitable result of these high rates, if they continue to be exacted, will be ruinous to the debtor and perhaps to the creditor also where his eagerness for high interest has tempted him to invest in hollow securities.

But allowing this to be so, what remedy has he to offer as an honest man? Unless the parties can agree, or the debtor can replace the existing with a cheaper loan, is there any other remedy but such as is found in the law of the land, either in the statutes of usury or bankruptcy, or in the enforcement of the obligation of contracts? The day fixed for the resumption of specie payments can be postponed if necessity requires it to be done; but is the legal existence of a large debt and a high rate of interest, as matter of contract, a reason for the introduction of a national swindle, under the specious name of the "American system of finance?"

But it should be remembered that the law of demand and supply regulates to a great extent the price of the use of money, or the rate of interest, as it does all the relations of value; and that during a period of universally high prices the rate of interest must necessarily be enhanced. On the other hand, when prices fall and things are adjusted and in their natural condition, whoever has good security to give can raise the money from some other source, or agree upon more favorable conditions with his creditor, and thus realize that reduction of interest which the times require.

As before stated, it is claimed that the average increase in the value of property in this country is not over 3 per cent. yearly. Does it follow as a logical conclusion that the rate of interest upon hired capital can be no more than 3 per cent. without ultimate loss to the borrower? Certainly the experience of men for generations has taught them otherwise in this country. I know of no State in the Union where the legal rate of interest has been less than 6 per cent. during this century; nor can the rate which the borrower can afford to pay be judged by a general and inflexible rule. So much depends upon the ability and good fortune of the borrower and the nature of the business in which the hired capital is expended that it is very difficult to see how the rate of interest can be regulated by the average increase of the specific property of the country. It would appear to be far more reasonable to suppose that the safe average of interest could be inferred rather from the increase of the valuation of the entire property of the country, for the reason that interest is the price of the use of property employed in the production of other property, and thus contributes to the enhancement of general values rather than to the multiplication of specific things.

Usually interest is paid upon capital employed in the more lucrative ventures and more productive business of the country, from which greater returns can reasonably be expected than would be indicated by the average increase of specific agricultural property; and it should be borne in mind that the average profits of agricultural pursuits, while surer, are less in amount than in other branches of industry; but the gentleman's method, as will be seen hereafter, even ignores the profits of the farmer, which he may invest in stock, bonds, and various other ways too numerous to mention.

The gentleman from Illinois overwhelms us with terrors born of false premises. He makes from the census an inventory of the farms and production of agriculture in 1850; and calling horses and mules $32.50 per head, neat cattle $1[illegible].80, sheep $1.31, swine $4, wheat per bushel $1, corn and rye 50 cents, and oats 33½, improved land $16.09 and unimproved land $8.04½ per acre, he finds a total valuation of $4,267,751,473. Each item of property being valued at the same price in 1870, he finds a total of $6,288,115,219, or an average income or increase of 3 per cent. for each of the twenty years, after making what he considers a just allowance for the destruction of property and interruption of industry by the war. Now, if the gentleman's calculation had led him to compare the actual value of this property in 1850 with the actual value of all similar property in the country in 1870, there would have been greater probability of approximate, although not complete, accuracy in his conclusions. By comparing values thus, which I insist is the only proper way in a reasoning process—which in its very nature can be nothing but a comparison of values or prices—the census shows the following result:

	1850.		1870.
	Number.	Value.	Number.	Value.
Horses and mules	4,896,050		8,270,785
Neat cattle	17,778,907	$544,180,516	23,629,608	$1,525,276,457
Sheep	21,723,220		28,477,954
Swine	30,354,213		25,134,569
Bushels of wheat	100,485,944	100,485,994	287,745,626	431,618,439
Bushels of corn and rye	606,259,917	303,129,958	777,863,344	583,397,508
Bushels of oats	146,584,179	48,861,393	282,107,157	94,035,719
Acres of improved land	113,032,614	3,271,042,469	188,921,099	9,262,803,861
Acres of unimproved land	180,528,000		218,813,942
Total		4,267,740,330		11,897,331,984

Being an increase of more than 278 per cent. in twenty years and 14 per cent. yearly. This is the true lesson to be obtained from the census reports if anything is taught by the gentleman's method. But in my judgment the result in any case is wholly unreliable, because it is utterly impossible to ascertain how much of the increase, both of specific property and of valuation, is due to the employment of hired capital, labor, immigration, inflation of the measure of value, and many other factors which have entered into the complex problem. We know the rates of interest which experience has induced mankind to establish by positive law, by custom of localities, and by agreement of parties; and the law of demand and supply operates with substantially the same results in fixing the price of the use of capital that it does in determining the price of any other element of production.

It is singularly inconsistent in the gentleman from Illinois, after making the tables of the census the foundation of his own argument, to turn round and accuse the source of his own information of unreliability and its authors almost of crime, as he does in these words:

The rates, as given in the census reports, are obtained by placing a fictitious valuation upon the several descriptions of property named.

It is accusing his own witness of lying whenever the testimony conflicts with his theory, at the same time that his own case depends upon the veracity of the same witness.

But there is no more reason to dispute the fairness of the estimated values than of the enumeration contained in the census. It undoubtedly contains in both respects the best data available. But even if values were inflated in 1870 as compared with 1850, in what way does that circumstance justify the views of the gentleman from Illinois? If our dollar was inflated, so was the interest. If the dollar was easier to get in 1870, so was the interest paid upon it, and the higher rate does not indicate necessarily a greater burden upon industry.

We pay interest upon just such a dollar as we hire. Interest fluctuates with prices, and will inevitably fall with them. In fact, interest during the last fifteen years has not held throughout the country so high a rate as the general prices of commodities, compared with what they were before the war. This fact is within the knowledge of every business man.

FALLACY.

Again, there is another most notable fallacy in the gentleman's deduction. He claims in twenty years an annual increase of 3 per cent. in the value of the agricultural wealth of the country. Now, what does that represent? Why, just what the borrowers have made and added to the permanent value of their own wealth, after supporting their families, the Government, and payment of losses of the war by the billion, and these ravenous rates of interest besides. Thus, if his illustration is good for anything at all, it proves that the foxy farmers have filched 3 per cent. annually out of the unfortunate Jews and usurers of the land; and this is again proved by the well-known fact that never was the great interest of agriculture so prosperous as it has been for the last twenty-five years. I admit that the result is ludicrous and that his whole argument is false, but I am not responsible for it.

COMPOUND INTEREST.

Startling and sensational statements as to the magic powers of compound interest at various rates and for long periods have been made upon this floor which, whatever may be designed by their authors, are calculated to alarm debtors, to increase their disquiet, and kindle the latent fires of repudiation and communism, by creating the impression that all experience is unreliable, and that they are being devoured by voracious creditors, and as most creditors are also debtors, that in short they are eating themselves. For instance, it has been supposed here that had America been purchased in 1607 for $1 and payment secured by bond payable with interest annually compounded in 1876 at 10 per cent., the amount would be—I have not verified the calculation—the very snug little sum of $136,000,000,000; five times as much as the country will sell for to-day. Captain Smith or Newport, whichever it was, has therefore been ruined, or would have been if he had run in debt a dollar for this continent.

It is very much like supposing that if Adam and Eve had continued to multiply and replenish once in two years until the present time, and all their descendants had lived and had been equally prolific, then, saying nothing about twins and triplets, there would now be actually alive upon the earth a quantity of human beings in solid measure of more than thirteen and one-fourth times the bulk of the entire planet; and if all these people had been thrifty and saved one cent a year and invested it at 10 per cent. compound interest, the amount in currency at eighty-eight cents in gold would buy not only all the real estate there is in this world, but ten times as much as there is in the universe at double the Government price for public lands, and leave enough to do the entire sewerage for the main streets connecting the fixed stars and to pave the milky way with well-cut diamonds of the first water, nine feet cube, three thousand miles wide, (excluding sidewalks to be made of condensed rainbows three billion to the square yard,) and a distance of 996,834,329,648,195,314,983 thousand million billion trillion miles long. And I believe there would be considerable left in bank even then.

But the truth is that Captain Smith ought not to have run in debt for his continent unless he was going to pay for it within twenty years. Even a debt of record outlaws in that time. Then he would have got it for less than $15, interest and all; and it does seem as though one dollar, especially in paper money, was cheap enough for such a farm as these 3,600,000 square miles, even at 10 per cent. compound interest. Almost any one would be willing to hire one dollar if he had a chance to make such an investment, yet the claim is made that he could not afford to, and this fanciful trash is sent broadcast over the land labeled mathematics, in order that the unthinking may not see the lie which such mathematics most certainly do tell. Really, has not the use of this 3,600,000 square miles of soil been worth something during the last three centuries? And if the rents and profits and net increased value had been invested in a sinking fund at the same rate of interest, it seems to me decidedly probable that Captain Smith and his heirs could pay up for the old place and have something laid by for a rainy day. It must be conceded that the down-trodden debtors of the Smith family have done well in this country on the whole.

The principle of interest upon interest does not exhibit its startling power for many years. It is in the interest upon the interest upon interest, and so on and on, which conceals the dynamitic fiend of high interest at short intervals unpaid for long periods. Nearly all interest-bearing debts are discharged within the term of the statutes of limitation. If not, and year after year the debtor adds the interest to the principal, it becomes like the conflagration, which, while yet a spark, might have been extinguished by the breath of a babe, but neglected too long, raging, devouring, destroying, becomes a terrible master, where it had been an obedient slave, and even an indispensable blessing. Interest is rent upon capital in the form of money, and, like rent, should be paid when due, as it is often the only income of its owner. To him it may represent the necessaries of life, just as to the borrower the use of capital hired may be essential to the transaction of that business from which he sustains himself and family. If not paid when due, it becomes a new debt or capital, for the detention and use of which there should be compensation.

Let any laboring-man count up the net savings which remain to him when wages are at the highest he has ever known, and then calculate whether he can provide for the contingencies of life and the decrepitude of age if obliged to invest his hard-earned and more hardly saved pittance at 3 per cent. What is true of his dollar is true of every other dollar. The experience of ages has given capital not far from 6 per cent. as a fair compensation for money used as an element of production. Whoever cannot employ it profitably at that rate should not contract debt at all unless unavoidably. He should rather, if in debt, go and sell all that he has and begin anew. No wiser economic saying was ever uttered upon the shores of time than the erratic exclamation of John Randolph of Roanoke, upon this floor, when, in the midst of a prosy debate, he sprang to his feet from a profound reverie, crying at the top of his shrill voice:

Mr. Speaker! Mr. Speaker! I have found the philosopher's stone: It is pay as you go; it is pay as you go.

But we are in debt, and the path of liquidation is thorny and difficult. Still it is better to be honest with ourselves even if it disturbs our complacency. There is no patent method which pays debts by miracle. We must toil and save. We must rely upon our brains and muscles in the field of productive industry, and, circumscribing our undertakings within the limits of our own capital and capacity, let usurious money-lenders and moonshine speculations alone, attend to legitimate business, cultivate the home virtues, and the employments of common life. Be content with a humble lot. The day laborer in this happy land feeds at a table which would have tickled the palate of Alexander. Here nothing is so independent, nothing so honorable as honest toil; so grand a thing it is to be an American citizen. No man, unless already involved in heavy business, is obliged to follow any pursuit which requires him to borrow his capital, and no man should, without reasonable prospect of satisfactory return And, as a rule, our people will not pay ruinous rates of interest long. Interest must fall and will fall as soon as confidence returns, and capitalists must seasonably heed the signs of the times; they should do so at once, otherwise production, now crippled, will cease, and general ruin stalk abroad. It is not to be wondered at, however, that the threat of repudiation, which is the inevitable consequence of the adoption of paper tokens for metallic currency, or convertible promises to pay, has startled capital and destroyed confidence. But for this, I believe that capital in abundance would be ready for investment all over the country in good securities at very low rates of interest to-day, and high loans could readily be replaced with others, and save many a farm and homestead which will now go to the block.

The remedy for excessive interest is in our own hands. What is needed is a steady head and a firm hand and comprehensive views in applying it. But appeals to the wild and communistic elements, which are latent in every society, exaggerated and agrarian declamation, will yield the fruit of anarchy and despair. But it is our duty to take a much broader view of the subject, for rates of interest will be adjusted by other causes when they are once set in motion.

THE REAL DIFFICULTIES.

The real difficulties of the situation remain, and it is our duty to address ourselves to the alleviation of the actual condition of the country. We have now a circulation of $371,827,220 in greenbacks, the Government's dishonored promise to pay, not bearing interest; $45,000,000 of fractional currency, the same in nature; and $346,479,756 of national-bank notes, redeemable in and therefore of the same value as greenbacks; making $762,523,690 in existence as a medium of exchange among the people. All this is worth about eighty-eight one hundredths of each dollar, and the greenbacks are a legal tender for all debts, public or private, except interest on the public debt and duties upon imports.

The existing contracts of the country, with exception of the national debt, have nearly all been measured at their inception by the dollar in currency, that is, eighty-eight cents in gold or less. Now, the problem which staggers the statesmen and business men and everybody in this country is on the one hand how to pay twelve cents on every dollar more than was originally received by the debtor and, on the other hand, how to transact the business of the country with a value measurer which is constantly fluctuating, and which, being already dishonored, will ultimately become a dead loss by depreciation unless the public faith in its redemption in coin is preserved intact.

But the loss of the currency is not the chief injury to be apprehended; its fluctuations operate precisely the same, only much more extensively, as would arbitrary and unforeseen changes in all the standards of weights and measures throughout the country on every day of the week, so that a man who had contracted to deliver bushels of sixty pounds might discharge his contract with forty pounds, or if in a pound of sixteen ounces he might be called upon to deliver thirty-two, or if for yards of cloth of thirty-six inches he might be called upon to deliver in yards of forty-eight inches or twenty-four; add to this the high percentage of profit which dealers demand to cover the increased risk of doing business, and which is in the nature of higher premiums for greater hazard in rates of insurance, also the perpetuation of the paralysis of production, industry, and commerce which already exists in consequence of the false relations of values growing out of variations in the standard used among the people, and from all these will inevitably result the destruction of the business and property of the country, as the process of depreciation and fluctuation hurries us with accelerated force to the bottomless pit of financial ruin. It is utterly impossible to remain stationary. Public confidence in a fixed measure of value, or in that which is least liable to variation, and which is therefore adopted by all nations as such, and that all commodities, credits, and values will continue to be measured and paid and estimated by that standard, is the thing to be attained.

Now, public confidence is a state of mind. The mass of movable capital in the country, or that which is available for investment, is in the hands of those who believe that they will lose it if they part with it for investment in production, unless the country returns to a specie measure of value in the transaction of business; because a coin is the nearest possible tangible representative of the abstract value called a dollar, so that practically it and the coin are the same. The world, with its accumulated wisdom, drawn from reason and experience, both sweet and bitter, is with them, and capitalists can wait, and will wait, choosing to foreclose their mortgages, apply their securities and lose interest for a while, rather than risk the destruction of their principal in that final conflagration of all property which would follow the introduction of the American system of finance, or from a prolonged refusal to return to the standard of coin. Confidence, then, must be restored in the minds of those who have capital to lend. It is not sufficient to convince those heavily pressed with debt that more printed money is or is not a good thing.

Business cannot revive until men see that it is safe to invest more money and make new contracts; that they can buy and sell upon credit with reasonable hope that their capital will not be destroyed and that their labors will not be in vain. Producers must have hope of reward, as well as mere lenders. This faith in the future can never revive until the return to a coin standard, by resumption of specie payments, is placed beyond reasonable doubt. The time when is less material. If the people believed in it and it were possible to make this new patent system work, that would be a different case; but the very fact that they do not believe in it and that you cannot make them believe in it is the one unanswerable objection to the attempt to agitate and introduce the scheme. Confidence and belief are the same thing, and it would be the work of generations to supplant the existing faith of mankind in the precious metals as the only safe measure of values. It is impossible to eradicate this sentiment of the soul. Confidence, which is only another name for credit in business, is most emphatically a plant of slow growth; and there will be no such thing as prosperity ever again known in these United States until the American people resolve by an overwhelming public sentiment to place all business transactions upon the world's basis of value. Meanwhile the losses of the nation by the inactivity of production are enormous. It is counted by billions since the panic of 1873, when the bubble burst and we found ourselves face to face with the troubles which beset us still.

Probably every year we now lose at least the amount of the national debt by enforced idleness of the people. What intolerable distress all this implies imagination is powerless to conceive. There is no way for debtors to extricate themselves but to repudiate, and that is ruin, or to get to work once more, which cannot be accomplished until the coin standard is placed in process of ultimate restoration, and continual, although it may be slow progress in that direction, is absolutely assured and is recognized as a fixed fact by the nation.

OUR GREAT DIFFICULTY.

Right here we meet with our great difficulty. While they who see the true state of the case are combating upon methods of returning to specie payments, the confidence that it will soon be done or that it will be done at all until after years of calamitous experience and universal bankruptcy does not return, because the question between specie and the paper token is still undecided. The public mind is still confused by the plausible and entrancing charms of these sirens of the great American system of finance. If at once all political parties, by conventions held in every State and by unanimous resolution in Congress, would declare their fixed determination to return by safe and careful steps and by wise measures, especially considerate and just in their operation upon the debtor class, to a coin standard of values, and that meanwhile there shall be no step backward, no further inflation of the currency, no pernicious efforts to destroy the national-banking system, no effort to set up the Government as the great banker of the nation and make the amount of the circulation dependent upon the will of a partisan majority of Congress, the necessities of faction, or the howlings of a communistic mob, confidence would return, and our troubles would cease.

I believe the decisive battle is yet to be fought, and that more attention should be given in these debates to the discussion of the fundamental principles of finance. It is assumed that they are too intricate for popular apprehension. But either truth or delusion will prevail, and the American people are wonderfully intelligent and quick to comprehend their own interests. The subject is abstruse in itself. It can hardly be otherwise when men of great powers of mind arrive at directly opposite conclusions relating to our financial condition, its remedies, and the proper methods of their application.

The ultimate question which arises in the mind of the capitalist and of the business man is, will the people choose a mere paper token without value, or coin, as a measure of value? Will they choose repudiation or the observance of the public faith? The fact that there is such a question at all is what prostrates business and buries innumerable homes in gloom. And this great, broad question, embracing all others, the people will settle by virtue of the instinct of honesty, whenever it is fairly and fully presented, so emphatically that agitators will not be able to find the chasm wherein their theories disappeared.

It ought to be possible for this Congress unanimously to set this question at rest by action dictated by an expansive patriotism which should eliminate the financial issue from politics. Any measure which provides for the gradual funding, payment, and cancellation of the greenback, at least until the amount is reduced to $300,000,000, and for the necessary and gradual accumulation of gold in the Treasury and in the national banks, and which, by virtue of the means it provides rather than the profession it makes, is a pledge of the nation to resume specie payments, which involves the restoration of the coin standard of values, and which insures that result within a reasonable time, even though the exact date be not specified, ought to and, I trust, would command the support of a majority of all parties in Congress, as it most certainly would of the country.

Although, as I said before, the only possible extrication of those heavily in debt lies in the restoration of business activity, of production and markets for production, which can only be found among those who, having themselves been enabled to produce, have something wherewith to buy; and although the restoration of confidence depends absolutely upon an assured return to a specie measure of values, yet I do not consider it indispensable that any fixed time be specified. But there must be measures taken and laws enacted which will lead inexorably and constantly, though not too rapidly, to the specie standard, and when enacted they must be let alone by Congress and enforced by the Executive.

We have now a date fixed for resumption. The method provided by law to enable the Secretary to resume is by sale of bonds at par, bearing interest at 5 per cent. on ten years', 4½ per cent. on fifteen years', and 4 per cent. on thirty years' time, and none of these bonds can be sold at par in gold. With no more gold in the Treasury than is required for the ordinary uses of the Government and no authority to reduce the volume of the currency gradually by funding, the Department must be extremely embarrassed, and probably must fail to resume without additional legislation. If such legislation is denied, how will it be possible to keep faith with the public, to whom we have pledged resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879?

It is hardly too much to say that the hesitation and delays of this Congress to promptly grant power to the Secretary of the Treasury to buy gold by the sale of bonds which can be sold, and to fund the legal tender while the abundance of idle capital will permit this to be done at advantageous rates, already constitute a breach of the public faith, for the loss of time and opportunity has greatly decreased the probability that resumption can be accomplished at the time now fixed by law. It is no excuse for us to say that the law of January 14, 1875, is imperfect. It was good as far as it went. It was the utmost that could then be accomplished. It was supposed to confer sufficient power to effect its purpose. It was invaluable as the expression of the sentiment and pledge of the nation to the restoration of specie payments. As the act of 1869 was a solemn promise to pay the public debts in coin at some time, so this was an equally solemn pledge to pay so much of it as then should be due on the 1st day of January, 1879.

This pledge is the law of the land. It was a promise to supply the means by enacting the measures found to be necessary. It is a breach of public faith not to do so at once, since experience has shown that further legislation is required. But two and one half years of the four during which it was proposed to prepare diligently for resumption remain, and we have less gold now than when the law was enacted. Meanwhile we squabble—we do not intelligently maneuver—for position in the great presidential contest close at hand; and, while the clamor grows for the repeal of the date of resumption, nothing is proposed to be substituted which shall necessarily produce resumption at all.

What would be the effect upon business and credit to repeal the act of 1869? Still more disastrous would it be to repeal the resumption act and provide nothing in its place. It would be a substantial repeal of both acts, and would be notice to the world, and still worse to ourselves, that the word of the American people is not better than that of a common thief.

Bad as the state of the country now is, the repeal of the resumption act with nothing substituted in its place will destroy all credit and make our condition far worse. It is our duty first to supply all needful legislation with intent to carry out our solemn pledge. It is soon enough to extend the time when its near approach shows that an extension is necessary. There will be three sessions of Congress after this and two and a half years' time prior to the date now fixed by law for resumption; but it is legislative shystering, by our present neglect, to compel the breach of our solemn pledge. We well know that to attempt resumption and fail would cover our country with a pall; it would ruin this generation; and there will be good sense enough extant when the time comes not to commit suicide. But if we go resolutely and honestly to work in these Halls and at the other end of the Avenue to make the necessary laws the people will concentrate their energies upon the accomplishment of the great event. Confidence will be restored at once, and the two years next to come will witness such a revival of industry and increase of our credit at home and abroad, as will either enable us to resume at the time indicated or after an extension very slight at furthest and wholly free from shock.

It is then a duty, not merely the dictate of expediency, to provide the means as rapidly as possible and resume at the earliest practicable moment. Men will understand it. There will be a policy permanent, safe, and we shall be on our way to the golden gate. It will be certain that our measure of value cannot fluctuate in any substantial degree. It must gradually rise to par with coin. It might even so exhilarate and stimulate the nation, which is really a giant bound with gossamer, as to bring about resumption before 1879. Sell bonds of small as well as large denomination, payable principal, with low interest, in gold, on very long time, in the best market possible, which is the home market; but sell them somewhere, and accumulate gold. A circulation of five hundred millions cannot be floated without three hundred millions of coin in the country. We have less than one hundred and fifty millions, of which twenty millions is silver. We ought to accumulate fifty millions or more yearly, and fund all the circulation not required by the wants of trade besides. Meanwhile our people would economize; capital would flow out into all the now stagnant currents of business once more.

Our teeming soil and the glittering treasures of the mountains will contribute inexhaustibly to returning prosperity. Every branch of industry will revive, and the despondent debtor will see light breaking in upon his pathway through all the varied avenues of profitable production. Real, and nearly every kind of personal property will rise in value at once, for values to-day are below the standard of gold, and the restoration of the old and tried measure of value will by the stimulation of prices more than pay the margin of 12 per cent. which the debtor fears to lose in passing from currency to coin. Resumption of the coin standard is chiefly an effort of the national will—a mental operation. It is the inexorable resolution to resume, and providing the ways and means to do it. The country demands a bold, strong act; it should be proposed at once; the path is plain.

TARIFF AND SPECIE PAYMENTS.

But I desire to offer some considerations upon the connection of the tariff with the resumption of specie payments.

I believe that this subject is at the bottom of the whole question of resumption. Resumption by the Government merely is comparatively easy. The heavy margin of loss to debtors, which lies between the measure of currency and that of gold, is the real difficulty. Almost every debt not payable by its terms in coin has been contracted by a measure of not over eighty-eight cents in gold for a dollar; and justice would be attained by making eighty-eight cents in gold a legal tender for every dollar of debt contracted at that or a lower measure in currency. If at the same time every new contract made on or after July 1, 1876, was measured, that is, made payable by coin, all business would be at once upon a specie basis. Eighty-eight cents in gold is all that creditors would receive if they were paid in full to-day; and with property depreciated below coin values, as they were before the suspension of specie payments, this is certainly sufficiently burdensome to debtors. Creditors would really get into their hands more property in satisfaction of their debts than if paid in gold values when business is active and prices are in their normal state, and an amount in gold which at interest would increase more than the 12 per cent. before resumption will be reached.

But such are the complications of the subject, and the conflicts of interest, opinion, and prejudice, that no measure of this kind will be adopted by the country, and the only solution is to take such measures as will enable producers to work out this large margin of 12 per cent. between currency and coin. And here we behold a wonder indeed. Just at the very time when all experience and common sense dictate a very large addition to our average tariff upon all foreign articles which compete with American industry and labor, we are met by a proposition to reduce the tariff. It seems as though, not satisfied with mere ruin, the statesmen who attempt a scheme like this were emissaries of a foreign nation, and were anxious to seize the moment when we are prostrate to take our life.

After the disasters of 1837 and 1857 we found relief by raising the tariff. We saved the country in 1862 by increasing the tariff. We have since too largely reduced it while the consequences of the war still remain, and now, just at the time when we ought to adopt a tariff almost prohibitory, this branch of Congress, under its acknowledged leadership, undertakes to legislate in the interest of free trade, so called, which is really the slave trade of American industry. True, a very high tariff checks importations and lessens the revenue derived from them; but, on the other hand, by its magic influence upon home industry and wealth, its irresistible stimulus to wages, immigration, and home markets, the taxable property of the country is increased in far greater proportion.

Foreign importations have drawn from us more than $1,000,000,000 in gold—the balance of trade against us since 1863—almost every dollar of which might have remained in America under a higher tariff, for American industry ought to be so protected as to supply American wants. An increased and properly adjusted tariff would increase the wealth of the country within two years more than the entire 12 per cent. of the margin of increased indebtedness which must be paid in passing from the currency to the coin dollar. The debts of the country, public and private, are estimated at not more than $15,000,000,000, of which 12 per cent. would be $1,560,000,000. The entire production of the great interest of manufactures in the United States in 1870 was estimated at $4,232,325,442. Under the present stagnation of industry, which, unless experience is a lie, would disappear under the fostering care of a high tariff, the value of manufactures of the country cannot be more than 60 per cent. of that which it would be in what are known as good times—that is, when every one is at work—which makes a difference of $1,692,930,176 in the cash value of the annual production in a single department of American industry; actually more than enough to enable the debtor class to pay the difference between their debts in paper and in coin, and almost enough to pay our entire bonded debt.

When we consider the impulse which a high tariff, by increasing wages, would give to immigration and to the value of agricultural production, by creating a more active and extensive market at home without decreasing the demand for our breadstuffs abroad, and the revival of labor all over the country; the construction of great lines of railroad communication along our northwestern and southwestern borders, which would be resumed with confidence if our people only could see that Congress was determined that American producers should be protected by American law, who can doubt that under a judicious increase of the tariff the people would lift up the burden of specie resumption like a strong man rising from sleep, and that the face of honest toil would once more beam with the sunshine of hope?

But no such prospect is before us now. This Congress has been urged by the leaders of the majority of this House not only to reduce the ordinary imports upon foreign articles competing with those of American manufacture, but even by a counter-craze to heavily tax almost the only indispensable articles for which we must depend wholly upon foreign nations, tea and coffee, the common solace of all. The men who cry out for free trade and gold dollars at the same time are cannibals, eating both their ancestors and their descendants, and yet howling for more population. They murder industry while they double its burdens. If there is no stop put to this insanity, the financial funerals of the money-centers of the country will ere long toll in fitting correspondence to the wail of the mechanic by the silent factories of New England, from the husbandman on the mortgaged prairies of the West, and from the devasted cotton and sugar plantations of the South.

But wiser men will come after us, and another Congress will lay the foundation for the permanent maintenance of specie payments by an increased tariff for the protection of American production.

NATIONAL BANKS.

There is one other important factor whose agency in the process of resumption is of great consequence, although not indispensable, to success, in regard to which I crave permission to offer a few additional observations. I refer to the national banks. They control to a great extent the movable capital of the nation and can greatly facilitate the process of resumption. The fate of business men is largely in their hands. They are now strong. They have passed through years of great prosperity, and they owe to the country which has fostered and enriched them now, while it is passing through the crisis from currency to coin, the most equitable, elevated, and patriotic action. This aid should be given by extending to business men every possible indulgence consistent with safety, by reducing rates of interest and discount, and by fortifying the hands of Government continually and in every exigency which may arise.

Not only duty but self-interest demands this course of conduct upon their part. Their continued existence as banks of issue may depend upon the exercise of an enlarged liberality to the debtor and business classes in this time of their utmost need. Based as they are upon the unimpeachable credit of the Government bonds and the personal liability of stockholders, and at the same time subject to action at law, as the Government is not, for the collection of its notes and promises when dishonored; non-political in their organization and influence; free from partisan control, which might adapt the volume of currency to its own purposes and to the ruin of business if it was issued directly from the Government to the people, the national banks have furnished to the country the safest and best circulation it has ever known except gold and silver. It is an act of great injustice to these banks, and, since they must for years remain an integral part of our money system, a great injury to the nation, to endeavor, as is so frequently done, to create prejudice against them by producing the impression that their profits have been greater than those of ordinary banking under the former system established under the laws of the States, and that they are merely licensed beasts of prey.

The national banks have first been obliged to buy the Government bonds and pledge them to secure their circulation, in the same way that the State banks were accustomed to pledge interest-bearing securities as the basis of theirs. The State bank issued circulation to the amount of one, two, and in some cases even three times its capital, the national bank only 90 per cent. of the amount invested in Government bonds. As banks of issue, both derived their profits from the interest upon their notes loaned. In no event could the Government, any more than the States, have any interest in the business of either system as banks of deposit, that being a purely private business, except to exercise the power of taxation upon deposits, which the Government has done with great profit to the revenues, while the State governments impose upon their capital an average tax of 2 per cent., and the aggregate of State and Federal taxes upon these banks is 4 per cent. upon their capital.

It appears from the official reports of the Treasury Department of the current year that the bonds bought by the national banks of the Government and held by the Government as security for the redemption of their notes in circulation as money were worth, on the 1st day of November last, at par, $361,498,112, and that, if the banks were destroyed and the bonds again distributed among the stockholders, they would sell in open market for $425,840,533. The total value in currency of the yearly interest on these bonds was $22,264,312. Now, this interest, it should be observed, is upon a principal bought and paid for by the stockholders and should be paid to them just as it would be if they were not engaged in banking at all.

The banks pay an annual tax of 1 per cent. of their circulation, or $3,253,482, which leaves the banks $19,010,830 in currency as the net amount of interest derived from their bonds; and I again call attention to the fact, which, unaccountable as it may seem, vast numbers of people overlook, that this interest is the same as that which the stockholders would have received if their money had been invested in real-estate mortgages or other securities, irrespective of their connection with any banking corporation whatever.

Upon the bonds deposited with the Treasury, the banks receive 90 per cent. of their par (not their market) value, in national-bank bills, or, November 1, 1875, the sum of $325,348,250. They are required to deposit 5 per cent of this—$16,267,413—in the Treasury as a redemption fund, leaving only $309,080,847 for actual use for banking purposes. Eight per cent. is assumed by the honorable gentleman from Illinois as the average interest received on this, which will produce an income of $24,726,467. Add to this the actual interest received from Government upon the par value of the bonds and the total amount derived from bonds and circulation is $43,737,297. The interest at the same rate upon the capital invested in the bonds would produce an annual income of $34,067,042, and deducting this from the combined income of the banks from bonds and circulation and we have $9,670,055, or 2¾ per cent. upon the market value of the capital as the amount of profit realized by the stockholders yearly more than they would derive from the same value of capital invested in other business or securities returning ordinary rates of interest.

I copy the following table from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency:

Interest on $309,080,847 of circulation, loaned at 8 per cent	$24,726,467
Interest on United States bonds, ($768,870 currency, $18,530,554 gold)	19,249,424
Premium at 16 per cent. on $18,530,554, gold interest	2,964,888
Total	46,990,779
Less tax on circulation	3,253,482
Total profit on capital employed	43,737,297
The total capital loaned directly at 8 per cent. would earn	34,067,241
Difference which represents profit on circulation	9,670,055

As above stated, the average taxation by the States upon the capital of the banks is over 2 per cent., which it will be perceived nearly cancels the profit upon the circulation realized beyond the amount they would receive if their capital were otherwise employed, and hence it is that so many banks are now surrendering their circulation, and either winding up or relying upon their business as banks of deposit, which has no connection with their functions as national banks of issue, and in which any association of men, firms, or private persons may engage without authority from the Government. I invite attention also to the following table from the same report, showing corresponding ratio of dividends for the last six and a half years in the several geographical sections of the country and the average ratio for the whole period:

The law requires the banks to carry one-tenth part of their net profits semi-annually to the surplus fund, which is not allowed to be drawn out in dividends, but is to accumulate until it amounts to 20 per cent. of the capital, and is to be first applied to payment of all debts and losses. This will be observed to include not merely one-tenth of the profits upon circulation, which is the only privilege derived from the Government that the banks enjoy, but also, what is far more important, one-tenth of the profits derived from their function as banks of deposit, which is a privilege or business indispensable to society and in which everybody is free to engage. This surplus is very large and in June, 1875, amounted to $133,169,095, or about 32 per cent. of the capital invested. This represents the accumulation since 1863, including that of State banks, merged in national, owned by two thousand and seventy-six banks, and is very largely derived from the loan of the deposits of their customers, and not from their circulation, as we have seen from the preceding analysis, and which they would still receive if the circulation was taken away from them.

The following table taken from the public records exhibits the number of banks, amount of surplus, and its semi-annual increase from 1863 to 1875:

The great increase in the years 1865 and 1866 is owing to the conversion of State institutions into national banks, and represents accumulations of those institutions in previous years, and hence is not properly a portion of the earnings of national banks as such. The dividends declared from time to time, averaging 4.1 per cent. semi-annually, with the addition of this surplus and the interest accumulating upon it, held as above stated as a security for the solvency of the banks, represent the profits of these institutions in the departments both of issue or circulation and deposit.

The total average earnings of the banks during the last six years has been a little less than 10½ per cent. upon their investment. Such a business as this is sufficiently profitable; and if its returns were purely in the nature of interest upon money loaned by individuals it would be just cause of complaint by the business interests of the country; but the great care and responsibility, as well as the labor required in the proper management of the complex and important affairs of a bank of deposit and issue, fairly entitle capital so engaged to some extra compensation. The trouble in the country today is not that the banks are strong, nor is it true that they have become so by reason of the excessive gains they have made from the business interests of the country; on the contrary, if they were weaker affairs would be far worse. But it is because an inflated currency, a spirit of wild speculation and reckless extravagance, and a reduced tariff have prostrated industry, destroyed markets, and banished confidence from the marts of trade. Thus it is seen that by the wise foresight of the great men who framed the national banking law, the circulation of the country is founded upon a basis which cannot fail.

The entire wants of the country, which before the war demanded a circulating medium of about $400,000,000, including coin, are probably upon a coin basis not far from $500,000,000 or $550,000,000, of which $300,000,000 in greenbacks, by the present law, will continue in circulation after as well as before their redemption in gold; or they may be replaced by national-bank notes by subsequent legislation. The redemption of the bank-notes which, January 1, 1876, amounted to $346,000,000, is secured by the total surplus and the market value of the bonds, (beside the personal liability of the stockholder to the extent of his stock,) making in all $569,000,000, to carry the sum of $346,000,000 of bills then in actual circulation, and the provisions of law are such that it will be impossible ever to destroy the safety of the national-bank bill. It is difficult to conceive of a system which could combine in a greater degree security and elasticity. Since the national-bank note is based upon the bond of the Government expressly made payable in coin, the people must defend the integrity of the Government, thereby protecting the solvency of the bond in order to maintain the value of the note which they use as their money. Thus it is clear that the national-bank system presents the same strong appeal to patriotism which is so eloquently urged as an argument for the direct issue of currency by the Government. Beyond this the personal liability of the stockholders would be available even if the Government should fail, an event which would utterly destroy a government currency, for any subsequent government would enforce personal liability upon contracts of a bank existing under the one destroyed.

ALL MONEY MUST BE PAID FOR.

Should the present system be replaced by direct issue of paper tokens, or even by the greenback currency, which, being a promise to pay by the Government, is therefore valuable, it has thus far been impossible for me to understand how individuals will get it without paying for it, and paying interest upon the capital it represents to individual lenders. These lenders must first pay for it, and thus part with that which would draw interest if retained. Having paid for the Government issue themselves, they will be likely to take interest when they part with it, unless they receive payment in property at the time.

There seems to be desired a vast system of Government banking, which must, until human nature changes, cost in salaries and stealings and mismanagement, far more than would be saved to the Government as the interest withheld upon the entire circulating medium. The Government will pay out these tokens directly to bondholders, public servants, and other persons who have demands against it. It will thus become their property. Will they part with it until it is paid for with other property equally valuable, or if loaned, until fully secured with interest? How, then, has this process benefited any one? Certainly it has not, unless the issued currency is worth less than the medium in which the nation was under obligation to pay, in which case something would be saved by robbing the creditors of the American people. Some have a vision, too, of saving interest upon capital by the Government opening broker's offices in every city, village, and corner grocery of the country, and delivering money which it is never to pay to everybody who is short, either with or without security, it makes no difference which; for in the first place the money would have no value, and in the next, if it had, the result would be that in many cases the Government would be cheated in securities; by fraud or incapacity of the innumerable agents it would be obliged to employ in transacting a business now performed by more than two thousand banks, and a multitude of brokers and private bankers which no man can number; by making investments, ascertaining responsibility of borrowers, and managing and collecting loans; and the Government would soon find itself a party to every lawsuit and controversy in the country, foreclosing mortgages, selling out securities—in short, transacting the private business of the American people.

DUTY OF THE NATIONAL BANKS.

The banks suffer with all classes in this time of depression and gloom. They are rapidly surrendering their circulation. More than $33,000,000 are already given up, and the best authorities anticipate the surrender of at least five millions monthly until business revives. Yet such are their resources that they cannot fail; but their financial strength and power of ready combination place them in a position to uphold both public and private credit in this emergency, and by so doing they may endear themselves to the people and perpetuate the system in the confidence of the country. It is an opportunity which both wisdom and patriotism must prompt them to embrace; a duty which they are under strong moral obligation to discharge, and neglect of which will insure their condemnation in the public judgment and lead to the final destruction of the system itself. The national banks exercise, under restrictions of law, in trust for the people, a portion of the sovereign power; that of furnishing a part of the current money of the land. Such a trust cannot be managed and enjoyed merely as a profitable privilege for private gain. Those who control these institutions are bound to remember their high functions and their semi-official relations with the Government and to the whole American people. They should cherish broad views and elevated sentiments; they should pursue that financial policy which shall disarm unfriendly criticism, relieve the burdens of industry, liberate the wheels of traffic and production, and place the financial condition of the country upon the indestructible basis of an elastic currency interconvertible with coin.

Every bank holds the chartered right to exist for twenty years from its inception, provided it does not violate the conditions of the organic law; and the current threat of their abolition against their consent is impossible of execution without the destruction of vested rights. It is, therefore, far better for the peace and prosperity of the country that the people should so understand it. Honest statesmanship owes, and will ever pay, candor to its constituency. The system will remain, certainly until this crisis is past, and we must deal with it as one element of the situation; and should these institutions rise with the occasion, they are our chief reliance; but should their conduct be antagonistic to the public good, should they degenerate into mere corporate Shylocks, illustrating anew the old saw that corporations have no souls; should they crush the credit and business of the country, by grasping enforcement of their claims and destruction of securities by ruinous rates of interest extorted from the necessities of prostrate industries, which should be fostered and stimulated by forbearance and by largely reduced rates of discount, it will be, and ought to be, found most difficult to restrain the people from the indignant abolition of the entire system, regardless of consequences to the banks as well as to themselves.

There is every reason to believe that the dictates of patriotism and enlightened prudence will prevail, and that the national-bank system will prove hereafter, as hitherto, a powerful bulwark in the maintenance of our credit at home and abroad. Considering the great service which we may justly require and expect of these banks in carrying business and credit steadily and at reasonable rates during this season of depression, it would be well for us to consider that it would be a process of years to accomplish the substitution of any other agency to transact the banking business of the country. What other agency can be devised, or, if devised, can be agreed upon?

FORCED LIQUIDATION OF THE BANKS.

The liquidation of the banks involves the collection of all their loans, amounting now to more than $1,000,000,000; and there is not a business man in the country who does not know that this process, arbitrarily enforced, involves the sacrifice of his property, pledged as collateral security, for a song, and general bankruptcy, by which enormous masses of property would fall into the hands of the banks. It is no sufficient reply to this to say that the loan and discount department of the banks could continue in operation after compulsory withdrawal of the national circulation; for while some of the heavy city banks might continue simply as banks of deposit, yet the great mass of these two thousand money centers, scattered all through the country, in these hard times, would be prostrated by the loss of the small margin of profit on circulation, and, preferring to rely upon the interest of their bonds only, would retire from the risks of business and cease to exist at all. And what then? After ten years of uncertainty, anxiety, and ruin, what will be substituted in their stead? All the problems which now perplex us will remain. The national debt will remain. Gold value will still be the measure of the world, and the same inexorable necessity of conformity to it will remain, and, after the loss of ten years of production and the destruction of the hopes, energies, and happiness of a generation, we or our children shall begin once more in sadness at the foot of the hill.

I am under special obligation to you, sir, and to the House for this extended courtesy, but I shall seldom trespass upon the attention of this honorable body.

Our country has completed the first century of her history, and now turns with gratitude, courage, and hope to the solution of the great problems and to the achievement of the grand possibilities of her illustrious destiny. Seven terrible years of blood won her independence from the world, and the tremendous internecine conflict of this generation has decreed the integrity and sovereignty of the American Union. We are a nation. A few men who have learned nothing while the foundations of the great deep were broken up are still harping of State rights and sovereignty. Should their physical lives be spared until the trump of judgment sounds, they would mistake it for the bugles of Beauregard signaling the bombardment of Sumter and the war of 1861. But these men are of the dead past. To them there is no future. Their voices will soon grow husky with time and their forms will disappear with their long-departed theories in the peaceful bosom of our common mother.

The nation is a unit. The man who now knows a North, a South, an East, or West, is a traitor in his heart. The future of this country is not in the hands of traitors or fossils. Inexorable destiny has made every man free, and our destiny is greater than we know. But our fate now lies in the just settlement of the great economic questions of the day. The laws of eternal justice will assert themselves, so will the fundamental principles of industrial economy, for they are founded in morality and necessity. They will be vindicated by the prosperity or destruction of the nation, according to the election it shall make of integrity or fraud as the touch-stone of its policy. The credit of the honest man is sure, and the nation can carry its burdens for generations only by preserving its reputation for scrupulous good faith. Neither can we preserve the high sentiment of patriotism in the citizen if there is a taint of dishonor upon the now bright shield of our national integrity.

No matter what clamor may fill the air for retrenchment, reform, and purity in the civil service, the great basic question before the country is, Will the American people keep their word and tell the truth by their deeds? Can the stream rise higher than the fountain? And will a people who vote to defraud their creditors be likely to maintain elevated morality in a government purely representative? All reform, all hope of permanent reform is in the essential honesty, self-sacrifice, and vigorous enterprise of the common people of the land. Every citizen, in private as well as in public station, is responsible; and while he denounces with unsparing tongue and pen all venality in high places, let him reflect upon his own life, and see whether he has not cheated his washerwoman or needlessly enforced his mortgage upon some poor man's cow. The man who finds none but villains in public or private life may thank God for the mercy, or luck, which has thus far enabled him to cheat the gallows of himself.

The retrenchment and reform which alone will bring permanent relief to this country are radical. They must be everywhere. Denouncing others, we must not forget ourselves; but listening to the still small voice of conscience and self-review, begin the renovation of the Republic in the bosom of the family and the silence of the individual heart. As a whole, the American people have never failed to manifest exalted sentiments and heroic devotion to all that ennobles human nature both in peace and in war. Financial adversity is now testing them in its fiercest fires. But let no man despair of the Republic. The integrity of the nation is sure, its courage indomitable, its resources boundless, and its prosperity, glory, and perpetuity are built upon the eternal rock.

STATUE OF ETHAN ALLEN.

Mr. HENDEE. I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the thanks of this Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people of the State of Vermont, for the statue of Ethan Allen, whose name is so honorably identified with our revolutionary history; that this work of art is accepted in the name of the nation and assigned a place in the old Hall of Representatives, already set aside by Congress for the statues of eminent citizens; and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Vermont.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, in 1864 Congress passed an act setting apart the old Hall of the House of Representatives for the reception and protection of statuary; and the President of the United States was authorized to invite each State to furnish the statues of two deceased citizens illustrious in the civic or military history of the State.

Rhode Island was the first to respond, and placed therein the statues of Roger Williams and Nathaniel Greene. Other States have, in a most worthy manner, complied, and now Vermont asks to be represented in that group and to be allotted its proper place in that historic and memorable Hall. My State has, through its governor, now passed over to the Government the marble statue of one of her deceased citizens illustrious mainly in its military history—Ethan Allen.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be appropriate and worthy of this House to pause in its deliberations for a while and forget for the moment the business of the hour that it may look back into the history of the struggle which made us the happy, united, and prosperous people we now are.

In accepting this statue from my State it is well, I think, to contemplate and speak briefly of the life, character, and services of so distinguished a citizen as it represents. Ethan Allen was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, on the 10th day of January, 1737. He lived in that State until 1769, when he moved to Bennington, Vermont, being thirty-two years of age. In order, Mr. Speaker, to acquaint this House more fully with the services of Allen, I may be permitted to refer briefly to the early history of my State.

The territory now the State of Vermont, was originally claimed both by New York and New Hampshire and a portion of it by Massachusetts. Settlements commenced in 1724 under grants from New Hampshire. Under these grants land was cleared, houses erected, and neighborhoods created. The grants were issued under royal authority and were purchased mostly by men from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. The lands occupied by the very first settlers were granted by the provincial government of Massachusetts, but by a decree of King George II made on the 5th of March, 1740, this portion of the State was found to lie north of Massachusetts and was made a part of New Hampshire. About this time Benning Wentworth was commissioned as governor of the province of New Hampshire, who continued to make further grants which amounted in 1754 to fifteen townships. In 1761 these grants had extended over a territory of more than one hundred townships each six miles square, and many actual settlements had been made and the inhabitants were increasing in number and improvements were progressing in proportion.

The government of New York, wishing to secure to itself the profits of these lands, became alarmed and determined to stop all further proceedings on part of the New Hampshire government. And in 1763 Lieutenant-Governor Colden, of New York, issued his proclamation, in which he asserted jurisdiction over all the territory from the west side of the Connecticut River to the east side of Delaware Bay. He based this act upon the grants made by Charles II to the Duke of York in 1664 and 1674. The effect of this proclamation among the settlers was to make them restless and doubtful as to the validity of their titles; and, to inspire confidence in the soundness of the New Hampshire titles, the governor of that province issued a counter-proclamation, setting forth that the grant to the Duke of York was obsolete and that the grants made by New Hampshire would be confirmed, even if the Crown should alter the jurisdiction. The inhabitants were exhorted by the governor to be industrious and diligent in cultivating and improving their lands and not to be intimidated by the threats of New York. The settlers became quiet and believed, as they had a right to, that, though the jurisdiction should be changed, their titles and the right to possess the lands they had purchased would remain undisturbed. New York appealed to His Majesty by petition for jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and on the 20th of July, 1764, he ordered that the western bank of the Connecticut River form the boundary line between New York and New Hampshire. This created no particular alarm among the settlers, as they believed, having purchased and paid for their lands and secured deeds under grants from the same Crown that had now changed the jurisdiction, that their titles were good and that they should not be compelled either to abandon or repurchase their lands, and, entertaining this belief, they were willing to submit to the authority and laws of the colony of New York. Now the trouble commenced; for the government of New York called upon the settlers to surrender their charters and repurchase their lands under grants from New York. Some complied, but most asserted in firm language their rights and refused absolutely to obey. They determined to resist all efforts to dispossess them of their lands, and for that purpose various associations were formed among the settlers. Appeals were made to the Crown, messengers sent to England, and many other steps taken to protect their rights and to secure to themselves permanent and indisputable titles. In the mean time suits of ejectment were brought in New York and judgments obtained against the settlers; but they resisted the decisions being carried into effect by various devices and sometimes by force.

The struggle went on in different ways until about the year 1769, when Ethan Allen came to reside among the grants and located at Bennington; and from this time forward his life was an active and remarkable one. Being an honest and just man, he at once joined the settlers in opposition to the authorities of New York. He first attempted to have the rights of the New Hampshire grantees protected by the courts; several cases were tried, but in every instance the settlers were defeated. These trials occurred in Albany, New York, and Allen was there in person. Before leaving Albany he was advised by the attorney-general to go home and advise his Green Mountain friends to acquiesce in the decrees of the New York courts and make terms with their new landlords and was reminded of the old proverb, that "Might often prevails against right." Allen coolly replied to him that the gods of the valleys are not the gods of the hills, meaning, evidently, that though the land-jobbers of New York were the gods of the valley of the Hudson they were not the gods of the green hills of Vermont. He returned to his home and a convention of the settlers was immediately called, in which it was decided to defend their rights and property which they possessed under the New Hampshire grants against the usurpation and unjust claims of the governor of New York by force, as law and justice were denied them. They carried their resolution under the leadership of Allen into execution. As they were resisting the laws of New York they were indicted as rioters, but the officers of the New York courts who were sent to arrest them, as one has said, were successfully resisted by force and were severely chastised "with twigs of the wilderness."

In order to render the opposition more effectual a military association was formed, and Ethan Allen was appointed commander. The association was composed entirely of the settlers, and from that time forward they were known as the "Green Mountain Boys." They were a brave, noble, and honest band of men, and while contending for a known right knew no fear, and dared to resist the unjust and oppressive laws of New York and its officers. They were denominated the Bennington mob by proclamation of the governor of New York, and by the people were resolved to be lawless banditti, and at different times rewards of £50 and £100 were offered for the arrest of Allen, and smaller sums for those associated with him; but all this availed nothing, as Allen kept up the resistance, and the New York land-jobbers, as they were termed, never succeeded in securing his arrest.

The sufferings and hardships of these early settlers were most severe and unparalleled. Houses were burned, crops destroyed, homes made desolate, and yet they resisted the authority of the laws and successfully maintained their organizations and retained their possessions until the close of the controversy which was ended by the prorogation of the New York Assembly in April, 1775, which never met again, being superceded by the revolutionary authority of the Provincial Congress. Thus far Allen had been contending for his own rights and those of his neighbors without commission or pay and as a private citizen.

It will be seen that Allen was engaged in contending with the authorities of New York for the supremacy of his rights and those of the other New Hampshire grantees for about six years. At this time war was imminent with England. The people had determined to throw off the yoke of tyranny and sue if need be at the point of the bayonet for liberty.

Allen loved liberty and now seemed to approach the time when the occasion for which he was born was before him. The time when he would be allowed the privilege and honor of striking a blow at the enemies of the principles he so much cherished and to vindicate his rights as an American citizen. He believed that—

> When God from chaos gave this world to be,
> Man then he formed, and formed him to be free.

At a meeting of a few citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, held about the 27th of April, 1775, it was decided that Ticonderoga, a fort on the New York shore of Lake Champlain, must be taken, and Benedict Arnold asked the privilege of attempting its capture, but the command was finally awarded to Colonel Allen, though Arnold appeared, presented his commission, and demanded the right to take charge of the expedition; but the men, most of them Green Mountain Boys, refused to serve under Arnold, and threatened to abandon the expedition unless commanded by Colonel Allen. Arnold yielded, but was allowed to serve as a volunteer. Allen had under his command about two hundred and seventy men, two hundred and thirty of whom were "Green Mountain Boys." On the 9th of May, 1775, he had marched from Castleton, Vermont, to a point on Lake Champlain opposite the fort. In the night he crossed the lake in small boats but was able to land only eighty-three of his men in time. The morning was approaching, and his men were drawn up in three ranks, when Allen thus addressed them:

Friends and fellow-soldiers: You have for a number of years past been a scourge and terror to arbitrary power. Your valor has been famed abroad and acknowledged, as appears by the advice and orders to me from the General Assembly of Connecticut to surprise and take this garrison now before us. I now propose to advance before you and in person conduct you through the wicket-gate; for we must this morning either quit our pretensions to valor or possess ourselves of this fortress in a few minutes; and inasmuch as it is a desperate attempt, which none but the bravest of men dare undertake, I do not urge it on any contrary to his will. You that will undertake voluntarily poise your firelocks.

Every man poised his firelock, and Allen at the head of the center file marched them immediately to the gate of the fort. He entered, driving the sentry before him, who gave the alarm; but Allen in an instant had possession, and demanded the surrender of the fort amid the huzzas of his men. Captain Delaplace, who was in command, soon appeared, and demanded by what authority, when Allen replied, in that sentence so familiar in every New England home, "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress." Delaplace remonstrated; but Allen, with drawn sword, again demanded the surrender of the fort, and it was surrendered.

This was the first great event in the military life of Allen, and I should say the crowning event; and it shows him to have been a man of executive ability, boldness, courage, and perseverance—a man who could command and at the same time inspire confidence and fidelity in those under him. The speech delivered to his men before they moved on the garrison though simple was effective. It touched the pride as well as the hearts of his followers, and under the lead of Allen they knew no fear as they, too, believed that his commission was from a source higher than that of any earthly tribunal. Allen afterward said of this event:

This surprise was carried into execution in the gray of the morning of the 10th of May, 1775. The sun seemed to rise that morning with a superior luster, and Ticonderoga and its dependencies smiled on its conquerors, who tossed about the flowing bowl and wished success to Congress and the liberty and freedom of America.

Mr. Speaker, this great event, one of the first successful blows of the Revolution, occurred on the 10th of May, 1775.

One hundred and one years from that very day, the 10th of May, 1876, this Congress and all the people of this great land and the whole world beside were invited to Philadelphia, the birth-place of our Republic, to witness the opening ceremonies of our magnificent International Exposition. An event, sir, which must and which does inspire every true American with that love of country, that devotion to principle, and that hatred of oppression which so filled, moved, and made victorious the hero of Ticonderoga.

Early in the fall of 1775, the little army which was commanded by Generals Schuyler and Montgomery, were ordered into Canada, and Montreal became one of the objective points. Allen, who was still at Ticonderoga, was requested to accompany the expedition. He went, and attempted, in connection with Major Brown, to capture the city of Montreal, which was guarded by royal soldiers. Allen was to cross the river Saint Lawrence a little to the north of the city, and Brown a little to the south. Allen executed his part of the plan, and on the night of the 24th of September, 1775, crossed the river in canoes, taking with him one hundred and ten men. Brown failed to co-operate, and the result was, of course, disaster. I will not here give details, but will content myself with saying that Allen made a desperate fight. The battle commenced about two o'clock in the afternoon, and lasted till near night, when Allen was forced to surrender, and, with his men, was taken prisoner.

Allen was in captivity for two years and eight months, and his treatment and sufferings for a portion of the time were of the most severe character, and worthy only to be inflicted by a half-civilized nation. He was placed in heavy irons, and taken on board a man-of-war, and sent to England. He was threatened with and expected nothing short of death as his punishment. Yet he was brave, independent, and never for an instant yielded his convictions that he had been fighting for a noble and liberty-deserving people, and a cause which must ultimately give freedom and independence to his native country. Allen was at times rough in his language, and was not what is now known as the polished gentleman. He was plain, blunt in expression, but determined in his purposes, and a man who could not be induced by threats or the offer of bribes to do a mean or wrong act, or for a moment to abandon his principles or become a traitor to his friends or country. As proof of this I will only call attention to one instance which occurred during his captivity. It was after he had been brought back to America, but before he had been exchanged, and at a time when he had no expectation of release.

A British officer of high rank sent for Allen, and when he appeared the officer addressed him thus:

Your faithfulness, though in a wrong cause, has nevertheless recommended you to General Sir William Howe, who is minded to make you a colonel of a regiment of new levies in the British service, and I propose that you go with me and other English officers to England and there be introduced to Lord G. Germain and probably to the King.

He also proposed to Allen "that he should be clothed equal to such an introduction and that for his services as such colonel he should be paid not in paper rags but in hard guineas. He further said to him that he should join General Burgoyne and assist in the reduction of the country, and when that was accomplished, which was certain to be done, he (Allen) should have a large tract of land either in the New Hampshire grants or in Connecticut, it would make no odds which, as the whole country would be forfeited to the Crown." To this, Allen replied:

That if by faithfulness I have recommended myself to General Howe I should be loth by unfaithfulness to lose the general's good opinion; besides that, I viewed the offer of land to be similar to that which the devil offered Jesus Christ: to give Him all the kingdoms of the world if He would fall down and worship him, when at the same time the miserable soul had not one foot of land upon earth to give.

After this Allen was admitted to parol in New York, and about the 1st of May, 1778, he was exchanged for Colonel Archibald Campbell and set at liberty. He immediately started for Valley Forge, where he was welcomed by General Washington with peculiar marks of approbation and regard. Allen at once offered his services in behalf of his country. He obtained leave to visit his home in Bennington, Vermont, which he called the "capital" of the "Green Mountain Boys." He arrived there the latter part of May amid great rejoicing, and under order of Colonel Herrick fourteen cannon were fired, thirteen for the United States and one for young Vermont.

While Allen was a prisoner his State or the people of the grants asked admission into the Union of States, but they were resisted by New York, and so fierce became the contest, and so uncertain the result, that on the 15th of January, 1777, the people of Vermont, through delegates in convention assembled, declared themselves independent. They took this bold step with the same spirit and determination that moved the colonies in declaring their independence.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Vermont made a declaration of independence. It was short and decisive. I will give it:

This convention, whose members are duly chosen by the free voice of their constituents, in the several towns on the New Hampshire grants, in public meeting assembled, in our own names, and in behalf of our constituents, do hereby proclaim and publicly declare that the district of territory comprehending, and usually known by the name and description of the New Hampshire grants, of right ought to be, and is hereby declared forever hereafter to be, a free and independent jurisdiction, or State; to be forever hereafter called, known, and distinguished by the name of New Connecticut, alias Vermont.

That the inhabitants who at present are, or who may hereafter become residents, either by birth or emigration, within said territory, shall be entitled to the same privileges, immunities, and enfranchisements as are allowed, or may hereafter at any time be allowed, to the inhabitants of any of the free and independent States of America. And that such privileges and immunities shall be regulated in a bill of rights and by a form of government to be established at the next session of this convention.

From this time forward until her admission into the Union, in 1791, Vermont was as independent as are the United States to-day, and yet she was vigorously and continually pleading at the door of Congress for admission, and New York was as continually and vigorously opposing her.

As soon as Allen was released he took a hand in this contest which Vermont had inaugurated for admission as one of the States of the Union.

In February, I think, 1778, Governor Clinton, of New York, issued a proclamation in which he said that that government "would vigorously maintain its rightful supremacy over the persons and property of those disaffected subjects"—referring to the people who had heretofore defended the New Hampshire grants and who had now declared themselves independent.

Colonel Allen published an address to the people in answer to this proclamation, in which he claimed it was mere "sophistry" and designed "only to deceive the woods people."

He closed his address by the following appeal to his followers:

You have experienced every species of oppression which the old government of New York, with a Tryon at its head, could invent and inflict; and it is manifest that the new government are minded to follow nearly in their steps. Happy is it for you that you are fitted for the severest trials! You have been wonderfully supported and carried through thus far in your opposition to that government. Formerly you had everything to fear from it, but now little; for your public character is established and your cause known to be just. In your early struggles with that government you acquired a reputation for bravery; this gave you a relish for martial glory, and the British invasion opened an ample field for its display, and you have gone on conquering and to conquer until tall grenadiers are dismayed and tremble at your approach. Your frontier situation often obliged you to be in arms and battles; and by repeated marchings, scoutings, and manly exercises your nerves have become strong to strike the mortal blow. What enemy to the State of Vermont, or New York land monopolizer, shall be able to stand before you in the day of your fierce anger?

Allen and his friends continued these efforts for admission annually before Congress, when, in 1780, or thereabouts, Colonel Robinson, a British officer, wrote Allen two letters proposing that he should join the British cause or assist "in uniting America to Great Britain, and thereby restore the happy relations which have been so wantonly and unadvisedly destroyed." In short, he asked Allen to become a traitor to his cause and his country. To these letters Allen made no reply, but inclosed them in a communication to Congress. In his communication Allen justified the course of Vermont in declaring herself independent, in the strongest terms, and to show his determination to establish that independence, and at the same time his desire for peace, and that Vermont should be admitted as one of the States, I will read a part of his letter to Congress:

I am confident that Congress will not dispute my sincere attachment to the cause of my country, though I do not hesitate to say, I am fully grounded in opinion, that Vermont has an indubitable right to agree on terms of a cessation of hostilities with Great Britain, provided the United States persist in rejecting her application for a union with them. For Vermont would be, of all people, most miserable, were she obliged to defend the independence of the united claiming States, and they be, at the same time, at full liberty to overturn and ruin the independence of Vermont. When Congress considers the circumstances of this State they will, I am persuaded, be more surprised that I have transmitted them the inclosed letters than that I have kept them in custody so long, for I am as resolutely determined to defend the independence of Vermont as Congress is that of the United States; and rather than fail, I will retire with the hardy Green Mountain Boys into the desolate caverns of the mountains, and wage war with human nature at large.

From what I have said and read it will be seen that Allen was a bold, determined man, and though sometimes rash, a most successful leader. The masses were ever wont to go where he might see fit to lead.

Allen was afterward made brigadier-general of the militia of Vermont, and rendered great service to his State and country. I will not go further into detail only to say that Allen finally settled in Burlington, Vermont, where he died February 12, 1789, at the age of fifty-two years. His remains lie buried near Burlington, Vermont, on a high point of land overlooking Winooski village and the valley of the Winooski River, one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys in New England.

The people of Vermont have always had the highest regard for the memory of Ethan Allen, and now that regard is attested by the act of the Legislature of that State authorizing the placing in one of the public halls of the nation at its capital his statue. The statue is of marble and is most beautiful in design and impressive in attitude and expression. It is creditable to the artist, and he may well be proud of it as a work of art. It was executed by Larkin G. Mead, a native of Vermont, whose reputation as an artist in foreign countries as well as in his own is of the highest character. The statue speaks for itself.

In our struggle for independence Allen took an active and decisive part. He was moved in this not by that love and morbid ambition to be heard and known of his fellows, which so much actuates men of the present day, but by that sense of justice and patriotism which brought into active service the best and most effective men of his time.

Mr. Speaker, we of to-day know of each other by being associated together officially and socially, we know our neighbors by daily contact in business. We judge the world and the times and the great men of the age by what we observe and know and we judge with commendable accuracy, but as to men of the heroic age we must appeal to history.

Allen was of that age, and from its history we are justified in saying that he was one of the pioneers of liberty and manfully wielded his powers and weapons in hewing the way for the progress, happiness, and independence of these United States. He helped to found the colonies from which the States sprung and to plant in their soil the scions from which has grown this great country with its institutions, its prosperity, and its model free government.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Vermont honors the name of Ethan Allen by placing his statue in the Old Hall of this Capitol, which to-day floats the flag of a free and united country, for which he fought and under which he led his little band of "Green Mountain Boys" to victory. In that hall among others are the statues of Washington, Greene, Roger Williams, Lincoln, Sherman, Trumbull, and Winthrop, the fathers and defenders of this magnificent Republic, and now Vermont contributes to that group a fit companion, a monumental representation of one whose memory and deeds it will ever cherish with that enduring regard and affection which has no common limit.

Allen was a man of spirit, power, indomitable will and courage, and yet was kind, just, and remarkable for his anxiety and efforts for any in trouble. He was a terrible foe to traitors, and his hatred for those who would abridge the rights and liberty of the American citizen had no limit; and let me say that Vermont has that love for the name of Ethan Allen which approaches near to reverence. Her sons of to-day partake of the same sentiment, patriotism, and courage which filled the breast of Ethan Allen, and the Government which he fought to create the Green Mountain Boys of to-day, if need be, will fight to protect and perpetuate. He taught a lesson and lived a life which has been read and reread until every true Vermonter is led to exclaim, "Let no man speak ill of Ethan Allen."

Mr. Speaker, Colonel Allen fought for a principle—the equality of all men before the laws. With his copatriots he helped to secure and make fast that principle and to establish that independence in this broad land which has been recognized by all governments for a full century.

Yes, sir, Ethan Allen was present at our national birth, of which this is the centennial year, and every Vermonter, yes, every American citizen, will recognize the appropriateness of the time sought by my people to make this presentation of his statue to this great Government.

One hundred years ago Allen was one of Vermont's most honored and devoted citizens, and at that time was giving his manly and heroic services for her protection, with a faithfulness, with a zeal, with an unselfishness and patriotism known only to that age.

That was the first period in our history that "tried men's souls." The second was in 1861-'65, when the same power which moved and sustained the patriots of '76 moved, sustained, and carried to victory the patriots of 1861.

When Allen was fighting to establish a free government, and to give it the ensign of liberty, the "stars and stripes," little did he think that in less than a century the grandsons and great-grandsons of the men who fought by his side would strike at the life of his and their country and ignominiously trail that ensign in the dust.

He did not once think, sir, that any generation that should follow his of American birth could produce a people that would without cause attempt to destroy the noble work of their fathers; but such is history. And I may be pardoned for saying here, I think, what the historian has long since truthfully recorded, that the Green Mountain Boys of 1861 carried into the battles for the preservation of the Union the same spirit, the same courage, the same faith in a just Providence, and the same patriotism that did the Green Mountain Boys of 1776 into the revolutionary war for the creation of this magnificent and permanent free government and the establishment of liberty throughout our entire domain.

Mr. Speaker, the green hills and rich valleys of Vermont are to-day inhabited by men and women whose sires and grandsires were the original settlers and pioneers of the New Hampshire grants, and I might say many of them are the direct descendants of the historic Allen family. And what are they? I answer, an intelligent, industrious, sober, honest, and brave people, who know but one allegiance, that to their native country; but one flag, that the "stars and stripes;" and but one god, and that the God of their fathers.

Mr. Speaker, on the 14th of May, 1778, Congress recognized Colonel Allen's services, and honored him by passing a resolution granting him a brevet commission of lieutenant-colonel in reward of his fortitude, firmness, and zeal in the cause of his country, and now let the American Congress honor his memory and that of the Green Mountain Boys who stood side by side with him in the country's peril by the unanimous adoption of this resolution.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, I venture to assert that no act of this Government during the past fifteen years of our marvelous history brings out in a stronger or clearer light the hopeful and buoyant character of our people, and the perfect confidence felt at all times by the loyal men of the North in the strength, integrity, and perpetuity of the American Union, than the law providing for a national gallery of statuary, in which "each and all the States" should be represented.

In the midst of that gigantic civil war, when the people of nearly one-half the States of the Union were in arms against the Government, and while General Grant, backed by the whole North, was striving with varying fortune to grasp the prize which McClellan, and Burnside, and Pope, and Hooker had, after the most desperate conflicts, failed to obtain, Congress, on the 2d of July, 1864, passed an act which declared that—

> The President is hereby authorized to invite each and all the States to provide and furnish statues in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown, or for distinguished civic or military services, such as each State shall determine to be worthy of this national commemoration.

On the 27th of November, 1872, the people of my State, in order to avail themselves of the benefit of said act and have Vermont properly represented in that illustrious collection of American statuary, by their Legislature, passed an act declaring that—

> The governor of this State is authorized and requested to contract, in behalf of the State, with Hiram Powers, for a statue in marble of the late Jacob Collamer, and with Larkin G. Mead, for a statue in marble of Ethan Allen, and said statues, when completed, to be placed in the National Statuary Hall in Washington.

It was the sublime conception of a noble and patriotic soul that first suggested the plan of inviting "each and all the States" to bring the statues of their illustrious citizens to this national gallery, that our whole country might be represented in this imposing and majestic assemblage of the worth and valor of the early days of the Republic. By it the history of this vast country during the first hundred years of its existence, wild and grand as it is, will be concentrated and made manifest in that hall to the people of all nations and all ages.

This tribute of gratitude and homage, although in forms more simple, has always been paid to the chivalrous hero and patriot statesman by those for whose rights and liberties they have labored and died. The brazen pillar and marble shaft, together with the life-like statue, wrought and adorned by genius and art, have perpetuated their names and images and immortalized their brave and virtuous deeds. It is the decisive and imperishable evidence of the people's appreciation of true heroism and exalted worth, which they demand shall be transmitted perfect and unchangeable to posterity.

If "Ilium such honors to her heroes paid," how fitting and appropriate that America, the last born among the nations, the secure abode and guarded dwelling-place of liberty protected by law, should not only imitate but excel all the nations of the earth in honoring and revering the memories of those through whose valor in the field and intellectual power in the council we are to-day the model republic and the leading sovereignty among the powers of the earth.

We learn from history's vast store-house of crystallized human observation and experience that divine Providence has always raised up men, prepared the way, and shaped the affairs of mankind for the birth and advent of any great and important occurrence in the history of our race. When Heaven interposed, in the person of our Saviour, for the salvation of a lost world, Augustus Cæsar sat among the seven hills of Rome and waved his supreme scepter of power and authority over a world prostrate at his feet.

Yet, a babe is born in a manger in the little village of Bethlehem, in an obscure province of his empire, whose kingdom has eclipsed all the splendors of the Cæsars, and shall have no end.

Leonidas and his two hundred brave Spartans at the pass of Thermopylæ, checked by their stolid valor the victorious armies of Persia, as they were sweeping like an avalanche from the orient, and saved for a time the tottering republics of Greece; and in later years

Boszaris, whose "sword won the battle for the free," drove the Musselman invader from her sacred soil and inspired her people with a new hope and courage.

The honor and heroism of Scotland were vindicated and her liberties preserved, in the hour of her direst peril, amid defeat and victory, by Wallace at Sterling and Bruce at Bannockburn.

Tyranny and despotism were driven from Switzerland and a perpetual republic established among her silver lakes and Alpine peaks by the patriotic sacrifices and illustrious valor of William Tell.

History while teaching by examples often repeats itself, and so when King George the Third finally committed himself to the fatal policy of taxing his American colonies without permitting them the right of representation, England was the first power in Europe and her jurisdiction covered the earth; "her flag was its symbol, and the hiding place of its power was within dark and frowning tiers of artillery; it compassed the earth with an iron belt of glittering bayonets; it spoke in the voice of the morning drum, and stalked with the nightly sentinel along the battlements of impregnable castles."

The "embattled farmers" at Lexington and Concord "fired a shot heard round the world;" Ethan Allen and his Green Mountain Boys demanded the surrender of Old Ti. in "the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress," and England lost her colonies, was shorn of her strength, and came near being reduced to a second-class power among the nations of the earth.

Vermont has now made her first contribution to the national gallery, and the statue of Ethan Allen, bold, commanding, and majestic, a credit to the youthful sculptor and an honor to the State, stands there amid the wondering and admiring throng, in an attitude of defiance and power.

The order of exercises to be observed on this occasion is prescribed by custom, and in accordance therewith I shall proceed to speak in the briefest manner possible of the life and character of the man whose effigy the people of Vermont, through their Representatives, now deliver to the care and custody of the General Government.

Of the early history and boyhood days of Ethan Allen we know but little, except that it is said he was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, on the 10th of January, 1737, and, following the impulse of his daring and adventurous spirit, removed to the New Hampshire grants when in the prime of life and cast in his lot with that liberty-loving, independent, and struggling people.

The first settlement within the present limits of the State of Vermont was undertaken by the government of Massachusetts in 1724, when they built a fort in the town of Dummerston, on the east side of the Green Mountains; but no sooner was this done than New Hampshire claimed that her jurisdiction extended to within twenty miles of the Hudson, which covered the fort and reached many miles to the westward.

To put an end to the conflict of jurisdiction between Massachusetts and New Hampshire, King George II immediately directed Benning Wentworth, then governor of New Hampshire, to drive off all intruders and take possession of the fort.

In 1749, the famous town of Bennington, on the west side of the mountain, was laid out, and its settlement commenced by order of Governor Wentworth.

The claims of Massachusetts and New Hampshire having been partially disposed of, New York now came forward and laid claim to all the territory as far east as Connecticut River, by virtue of a previous grant from the Crown of Great Britain, and proceeded to turn off all clearers of the land and cultivators of the soil. She at once established courts of justice over the disputed territory, and caused decisions to be made in favor of those who claimed the lands under her authority. She refused utterly to acknowledge the title of the settlers to their lands, and compelled them to either lease them, with all their buildings and improvements, or purchase them from those whose usurped rights and titles they repudiated. The result was the settlers refused to vacate, and the new claimants commenced actions of ejectment in the courts of New York, obtained judgments, and attempted to remove the settlers by force. In the midst of all these collisions and conflicts Ethan Allen, then about thirty-two years old, removed from Connecticut to the grants, and at once took a very decided stand in favor of his fellow-settlers and against the usurpations and encroachments of New York. The mind shudders to contemplate what the consequences might have been in this state of affairs between the New York authorities and the settlers on the grants had not Providence interposed and turned aside the impending evil by calling both parties to unite their efforts against a common foe.

The daring achievement which flashed the name of Ethan Allen, like a meteor athwart the nation's sky, was the first act in a drama which changed the whole history of this country, and gave to the world a nobler humanity and a purer and more enlightened civilization. That sublime deed of voluntary and self-imposed duty, performed by Allen and his devoted followers, emitted a spark which exploded the world's magazine, and lit up the whole universe of God with a light whose dazzling brilliancy shall continue to increase until earth shall be from her center hurled, and the dark shadows of time shall melt away into the glorious brightness of a heavenly eternity.

The colonies of Massachusetts and Connecticut were settled by a race of men composed of the very cream and essence of European society, and whose equals have not been known in the world's history. From this stock came the seed which caught root amid the rocky wilds and snow-capped hills of the Green Mountain State, and there, surrounded by domestic violence, menaced by the savages of the forest, and rocked by the throes of a revolutionary convulsion which shook every throne in Christendom, grew up a race of men who loved liberty and hated oppression and tyranny; who were born and reared in the vitalizing atmosphere of rugged virtue and honest industry; a race which has never deserted its first love, and has never, thank God, disgraced the name or brought discredit or shame upon a noble ancestry. They were men who sincerely and religiously believed that "resistance to tyrants was obedience to God;" "that the gods of the valleys are not the gods of the hills." They were an uncomfortable race to coerce into any line of conduct not agreeable to their sense of duty and of right. No blandishments could seduce them and no threats intimidate them; they could endure the heat of summer and the frosts and snows of winter; they were as handy with the pen and upon the stump as they were with the rifle and the sword; they had strength and manly courage, with will and conscientious convictions, to back them up; they were a perfect leprosy, and worse than the plagues of Egypt, to old King George, and Burgoyne said they were "the most wild, active, and rebellious race that he knew on the whole continent."

With New York upon one side, and New Hampshire upon the other, seeking to rob them of their birth-right, Great Britain upon the north threatening them with slaughter and fiery vengeance, and the Continental Congress treating them as the illegitimate offspring of an illicit intercourse; smarting under their wrongs, writhing under the scorn and insults heaped upon them, and ready to retire to the rocks and caves of their native mountains and wage unceasing war with humanity at large for what they knew to be their rights, it is no wonder that, when the news spread through the valleys, over the hills, and along the shore of their beautiful lake, that the blood of their fathers and brothers had been shed by a hireing soldiery; that the long expected and anxiously looked for moment had arrived; that the spirit of American liberty had received its first baptism of blood and fire at Lexington and Concord; that the tocsin of freedom had been sounded and the flag of Independence unfurled—was it any wonder, I say, that from every log-cabin and cave upon the grants should have burst forth the inspiring and defiant notes of Ethan Allen's war-song?

Tradition has it that the following lines were composed by Colonel Allen when gathering his clans. However that may be, there can be no doubt but they breathe the spirit which inspired the hero in his determined opposition to British tyranny:

Ho—all to the borders! Vermonters come down,
With your breeches of deer-skin and jackets of brown,
With your red woolen caps, and your moccasins, come
To the gathering summons of trumpet and drum.

Come down with your rifles!—let gray wolf and fox
Howl on in the shade of their primitive rocks;
Let the bear feed securely from pig-pen and stall—
There's a two-legged game for your powder and ball.

What seek they among us? The pride of our wealth
Is comfort, contentment, and labor, and health,
And lands which, as freemen, we only have trod,
Independent of all save the mercies of God.

Come York or come Hampshire—come traitors and knaves;
If ye rule o'er our land, ye shall rule o'er our graves;
Our vow is recorded, our banner unfurled;
In the name of Vermont we defy all the world!

The moment colonial valor had struck the first spark of American liberty, Allen began to look with longing and anxious eyes upon Fort Ticonderoga. The capture of that fortress, he knew, would not only give him vast quantities of arms, ammunition, and stores, but would break the cordon of forts extending from Canada to the Hudson River, secure the possession of Lake Champlain, and enable him to protect the settlers upon the grants from the power of England and her savage allies.

The forts of Ticonderoga and Crown Point had always been regarded as of the most vital importance by the French and English respectively, as each had held possession of the country, because they constituted the gate-way between Canada and the colonies. Consequently this region had been the scene of hostile strife and bloody battles for two centuries.

Only a few months before the affair at Lexington and Concord, General Gage, then in command of His Majesty's forces at Boston, had determined to repair and re-enforce both of these forts, but in his fancied security, arising no doubt from his contempt of the colonists, he had neglected it.

This fact, and the condition of the forts and number of the garrisons, was known to Allen, to Samuel Adams, and Joseph Warren, and also to two or three members of the provincial legislature of Connecticut, who took a deep interest in the welfare of the colonies, who at once adopted measures looking to their capture, whenever hostilities should commence, which was then hourly expected. On the 19th of April the bloody scene on Lexington Common and the skirmish at Concord Bridge set the whole country in a blaze, banished all hopes of a reconciliation with the king, and put the patriots of America in a defensive attitude to the Crown and power of the mother country.

Eight days after this every man in the colonies and upon these grants had a full knowledge of the situation, and the previously arranged plans for the capture of these forts were put into practical operation. Upon the personal responsibility of Silas Dean and David Wooster, of New Haven, $1,000 was raised to pay the expenses of the campaign, and Edward Mott and Noah Phelps were sent to the frontier towns to spy out the land, and, in connection with Allen, to start the expedition.

Full of hope and burning with holy zeal in the cause dear to their hearts, these men proceeded northward, arriving in due time at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, with sixteen men. Here they were joined by Colonel Easton and John Brown, with men enough from Massachusetts to swell the whole number to forty men all told.

Not halting at Pittsfield, only to collect up their men, they pushed on to Bennington, where they found Allen, who had already been notified of their coming, ready to receive them, with the squad of Green Mountain Boys which he had called together. At Bennington a council of war was held, Allen appointed commander, the place of rendezvous fixed at Castleton, and all the plans laid and matured for the capture of the forts. On the 7th of May an intrepid band of two hundred and seventy men, all of whom except forty-six were Green Mountain Boys, had collected at Castleton, with Allen at their head, devoted, soul and body, mind and spirit, to the accomplishment of this bold and daring design. All was now ready, Allen was in his glory, and the men impatient for the word. Captain Herrick was sent with a detachment of men to Whitehall to capture the younger Skeene, together with all the materials collected at that place, and then join Allen with the main body at this point. Major Douglas was sent to Panton to secure all the boats that could be discovered, and return to Shoreham with all possible dispatch, as upon his success chiefly depended the means of transporting the troops across the lake. Word was sent to Remember Baker to co-operate with the expedition from his position at Otter Creek, while Major Beach was sent to Rutland and adjoining towns to arouse the settlers and gather in the volunteers, which duty he faithfully performed, traveling on foot a distance of sixty miles in twenty-four hours, and reported to Allen in time to aid in the capture of the fort.

The present is not the time and this is not the place to enter into a critical analysis of the life and character of the hero of the Green Mountains; suffice it to say that at the time he took command of this expedition he was thirty-eight years old and, as has been well said, was in every sense a remarkable man. His physical organization and character eminently fitted him for the task upon which he was about to enter, and his whole life seemed to have been spent in rendering him more fit for it. In frame he was gigantic, in disposition bluff, petulent, willful, daring, jealous, and tenacious of his individual rights and those of his fellow-settlers; he added to these qualities a sincere and pure patriotism that never cooled or grew dim, and a courage and sagacity equal to any emergency.

"Out of his fiery zeal and fierce struggles, in the end," came the State of Vermont and the establishment of all her boundaries. He was the pet and idol of every man upon the grants and the scourge and terror of their foes. The beach seal and the skin of the catamount were the instruments of his vengeance; and usurping magistrates and bogus tax-collectors fled the borders at his approach. His presence was commanding and his soul deeply imbued with the spirit of liberty. He was thoroughly acquainted with the wants of his people and the wrongs and insults they had suffered. His whole life had been one of strife and contention while battling for the right. Through his prowess and negotiations Vermont became neutral ground during the war, by his strategy the desolating scourge was averted from her people, and through his statesmanship she was at last admitted into the Union.

It is no wonder then that this man in the spring of 1775, when the light in the steeple of the old South church called freemen to arms, should be found thoroughly disciplined and "ripe for treason, stratagems, and spoils."

On the 9th of May, Allen with his little army of two hundred and seventy men, moved cautiously through Sudbury, Whiting and Shoreham to a point called Hand's Cove, on the eastern shore of the lake, arriving there under cover of darkness. Here new difficulties awaited them. Douglas had not reported with boats, and Captain Herrick had not then arrived with his new levies of men, designed as re-enforcements; hour after hour passed, and yet no boats appeared; Allen chafed and roared like a caged lion, and the men, as soldiers always do when kept still, swore like the army in Flanders. Daylight was now approaching and unless the assault was made upon the fort at once, they would be discovered by the garrison, and the entire object of the expedition be defeated, for they could no more capture the fort, except by surprise, than Satan could carry the battlements of heaven by storm. At last one old scow, scarcely able to hold itself above water, is brought from Panton, and another captured from a negro, and the two are found to constitute the only means of transporting these Argonauts in search of the golden fleece on the other side.

Into these two frail barks Allen loaded himself and eighty-two of his courageous and desperate men; the old boats, heavy laden, sink deep in the soft blue waters, while the bronzed and weather-beaten Vermonters, with strong arms and stout hearts, with vigorous strokes drive them toward the opposite shore. As they near the shore the misty outlines of the fort loom up in the gray of the morning, like some grim giant waiting to crush them at a single blow; and just as the first faint light of the approaching day becomes visible above the summits of Killington, Pico, and Bristol, the keels of the old scows touch the western bank, and Allen and his men spring eagerly upon the beach.

The line is silently and quickly formed; young Beman is at the front to act as guide and devote the first act of his young life to his country, and link his name in history with Allen's. Every hand clutches firmly and closely his trusty rifle. Every heart throbs with high hopes and stern resolves as they gaze upon the grim walls of the frowning fortress and the brazen mouths of hostile cannon, which at the least sound of alarm would vomit forth a storm of fire which would sweep them from the earth.

Only about one-third of the men are across, but delay is impossible; the assault must be made at once; the undertaking is dangerous, and the result doubtful. No man should be compelled to go against his will; the order is given that those who are willing, single-handed, to beard the lion in his den, to storm the fortress, to join this forlorn hope, to rush to glory or the grave, should poise their firelocks. Instantly every gun is poised, and Allen knows he has no cowards in his band.

One word before the order is given to forward, and the lion-hearted leader mounts the log: "Vermonters, I have summoned you from your homes and led you into the very jaws of death; we must this morning quit our pretensions to valor or possess ourselves of this fortress; this covered way to yonder fort will be to us the path to immortality or the grave; up that dangerous steep I propose to lead you; if we fall a sacrifice, liberty and our country demand it. The loved and helpless ones in yonder cabins among the hills implore us to be brave and drive these ruthless invaders from our soil and our homes. I hear the voice and cheerfully obey. I feel the inspiration of this moment, and hasten to seize the prize; and trusting in the God of battles and the justice of our cause, follow me and I will lead you to deeds which shall make this day immortal, cover the Green Mountain Boys with imperishable glory, and make their names the watchword of liberty, while a tyrant shall remain to disgrace the image of his Maker, or pollute the earth with his presence."

His words are finished; the hero draws his sword; the order comes to "right face!" every man is in his place, and every heart beats responsive to the hero's will. Cautiously, silently, but swift as lightning he leads them on, while the youthful hero, Beman, points out the devious way. The frightened and astonished sentinel at the gate, as he meets the fiery gaze of Allen, snaps his musket, which God prevented from being discharged, and flies to the fort for succor and alarm. When he gets to the inner gate, he attempts to bar it against the approach of Allen and his men. Deacon Amos Weller, of Rutland, with the body of a giant, was in the front file. "Uncle Amos, put your shoulder to this gate!" shouts Allen, ere the line had come to a halt. Uncle Amos obeyed, and in a moment more down came gate, sentinel, Uncle Amos and all, thundering to the ground. They are now within the fort, and Allen, in his wild excitement, rushes for the officers' quarters, while the men come leaping in through the casemates and the gate, and quickly form in a hollow square upon the parade.

"Where is the officer of this fort?" cries Allen. "Let him come forth and instantly surrender, or I will sacrifice every man in the garrison." With blanched cheek and trembling limbs, Delaplace hurriedly opens his bed-room door, and with pants in hand and drawers but partly on asks by what authority he makes the audacious demand for the surrender of the fort. "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" roared Allen, in tones which awoke the echoes in the far-off Green Mountains, while his sword quivered and trembled over the head of the frightened Briton.

As might be supposed, after such a demand, by such a man, in the name of such a power, no more parley could be held; and the fort, with two officers, forty-eight men, rank and file, one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery, together with a large amount of arms and ammunition, was instantly surrendered, and Ethan Allen and Old Ti. were from that moment immortal.

Soon after the capture had been made, Seth Warner came over with the remainder of the force, and Allen found himself in this British stronghold at the head of two hundred and twenty-six men, of whom one hundred and forty were from the New Hampshire grants and known far and wide as Green Mountain Boys, seventy were from Massachusetts, and sixteen were from Connecticut. With so small a force it was necessary to be constantly on the alert, and Warner was sent off instantly to take Crown Point, which he did next day, capturing eleven men and sixty-one serviceable cannon. The conquest having been made reasonably secure, the old dispute between Allen and Arnold, which had been compromised at Castleton, broke out again; but it was at last arranged by a sort of joint command, under which St. John was seized and all British craft on the lake captured. The enemy having been swept out on the north, Ethan Allen went away to receive the plaudits due to his exploits. He was accorded the honor of a public reception on the floor of the Continental Congress, and a similar mark of public gratitude was accorded him by the provincial congress of Massachusetts. The whole land rang with his name and fame. "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress" became a watchword and a pean.

In the midst of his glory Ethan Allen organized an expedition to take Montreal and Quebec. At the outset of this enterprise he was taken himself, and the next two years and seven months he spent as a prisoner in British dungeons and war vessels. Most of the time he was in irons, and hardly ever was he treated as a prisoner of war. In British eyes he was an audacious rebel, and the wonder is he was not hanged. But at last he was exchanged at the Staten Island station, and was at home again in the American lines at New Brunswick, New Jersey. Congress sought to recompense him for his sufferings by voting him a commission as colonel in the Continental Army. He accepted it; but it does not appear that he ever joined the army. As the hero of Ticonderoga his military career began and ended, and his restless, adventurous life came to an early close in 1789 from an attack of apoplexy.

From the capture of Old Ti. down to the close of his life Allen devoted himself wholly to the work of quieting the titles of his people to their lands, settling their disputes, protecting them by force and strategy from the ravages of the war, and by his boldness, sagacity, and dashing policy overcame all opposition and prepared Vermont for admission into the Federal Union, which was finally accomplished two years after his death.

Such in brief, Mr. Speaker, is the history of the man and of the capture of that renowned fortress which, although not vast in the number of men and value of property captured, yet was transcendently important when it is remembered that it was the first offensive and aggressive movement on the part of the colonists and the first grand success in the long struggle for independence which followed. It formed a barrier against the intrusions of the treacherous Canadians and savage Indians on the north; it gave the colonists confidence in themselves and secured them the respect and esteem of mankind; the name of Allen and his Green Mountain Boys became the patriot's battle-cry, and will live in song and story as long as heroic deeds and noble self-devotion to the cause of liberty and free government shall command the veneration and homage of our race.

In the wealth and abundance of Vermont's great names and glowing examples I can but feel that the selection made by the people of my State of the men to represent them in that mute but eloquent group is peculiarly apt and fortunate.

While Ethan Allen nobly represented one extreme of Vermont character and reputation Jacob Collamer as fully and worthily represented the other; and together they embodied and combined the patriotism, learning, culture, daring, intelligence, pluck, advancement, and civilization of the people of that State during the first century of their political existence.

The statue is certainly one of the boldest designs and finest specimens of art produced by American genius and skill. It represents the hero at the moment when, standing upon the stair-case with his left arm thrown across his breast and his right hand grasping his huge blade, he announced to the astonished and affrighted Laplace the high authority by which he demanded the immediate surrender of the fort.

The people of Vermont prize this statue, not only because it is a true and vivid representation of their early champion and patron saint, but because it was conceived and executed by one of her own talented and worthy sons.

"The sculptor's chisel cannot delineate his qualities of mind and heart," or produce that voice which, amid gloom and despair, echoed from Maine to Georgia as it called the men of the Green Mountains to arms in the cause of freedom and independence, but it will, at least, "remind the observer of one whose life was made illustrious by distinguished services rendered in the dark day which ushered our nation into being."

Vermont presents this noble effigy of her son as worthy the companionship of the most illustrious dead by which it will be surrounded and as her rich offering to the nation's sacred treasure. In the name of that gallant people we bring it here and place it beside those of the men who knew and trusted him in the dark and bloody days of the Republic. The spirits of heroes and statesmen welcome him to that august presence, and the bronze and marble lips greet him as he steps forth to take his place among that immortal band. It is well that they should be placed here in the nation's Capitol, in the very center of the strength and majesty of the republic and in the hall which has so often echoed the voices of the ablest orators and statesmen in the land.

The simple ceremonies we perform to-day will soon be forgotten and those who engage in them will pass away, but the hero we honor and the principles his marble is intended to commemorate will live forever.

In coming years it will be the Mecca, and our children will gather there to renew their loyalty and gain fresh courage and a new inspiration for the high and sacred duties of life; there they will recount the deeds of heroic valor of Allen and his brave men, and in that sainted presence rekindle the holy fires of liberty and patriotism which flashed forth on the 10th of May, 1775, at Old Ti. What Vermont heart shall ever grow so callous as not to warm when he beholds it? What American will not be strengthened when his eyes shall rest upon it? And as we stand in that consecrated hall and look upon that towering and majestic form and those that surround it, God grant that it may always inspire us with the same love of liberty, devotion to duty, and contempt of danger in the cause of right which have enshrined the name of Ethan Allen in the hearts of the American people and placed his statue in the nation's niche of fame.

Mr. HENDEE. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the concurrent resolution was unanimously adopted.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PIPER. Mr. Chairman, migration, considered as to its causes and effects, presents analogous and even identical characteristics in all ages and in all countries. On every page of history we find accounts of the wanderings of patriarchal tribes and barbarous hordes, and since the dispersion of the peoples by the confusion of tongues, human families have been moving over the earth, from north to south, from east to west, impatient and unweary, until they succeed in finding a territory suited to their tastes and wants, which becomes their adopted country, the theater of their future development. When once transplanted to a propitious spot, they take root, grow, and perpetuate themselves as a distinct people. Inspired with a desire of improving their condition, actuated by a love of conquest or of gain, or impelled by a spirit of enterprise, these hardy pioneers become the founders of colonies, which, by gradual accretions, grow to be powerful nations.

Careful and judicious observers have proved that these movements took their start from the elevated region of Central Asia, the supposed cradle of mankind. Its nomadic inhabitants, in process of time and to escape the evils of overpopulation, poured out in swarms through its solitary passes and spread over the countries of the Eastern Hemisphere. From this center came the Huns, the Tartars, the Mongols, and other Asiatic tribes which devastated Europe and whose exploits are recorded by the Roman and the Byzantine historians. These conquests, originating through love of plunder, were also inspired by the fierce pleasures of war and of senseless devastation.

But there were other migrations much more peaceful in their nature, and of these the most prominent were the expeditions to strange and unknown countries conducted by the Phenicians and Carthagenians in ancient and by the Iberians and the Anglo-Saxons in modern times. As for many centuries the means of locomotion were limited, the progress of these early movements was slow, being made principally by land, while the naval adventures sent out in ships of diminutive size were comparatively few in number.

This circulation of tribes and companies continued for many thousand years; but at last the human race settled down in permanent occupancy of certain well-defined limits, and now, toward the close of the nineteenth century, the globe is portioned out among four distinct races, destined hereafter to keep separate and apart.

THE FOUR GREAT RACES OF MEN.

The four great races of mankind—the white, the yellow, the black, and the red—in their migrations have divided the earth among themselves in unequal proportions. The white race, excelling in strength, activity, and intelligence, and possessing a high degree of civilization with its predominating forces, has conquered three-fifths of the habitable globe, leaving the remaining two-fifths for the semi-civilized yellow race, the savage African, and the perishing red man. The white race has been endowed with qualities especially fitting it for possessing and occupying the earth to the exclusion of all other classes of mankind; it seems to be instinctively cosmopolite, disseminates itself easily in places propitious to the whites, and does not recoil before the heats of the torrid zone.

The members of the Anglo-Saxon branch, possessed of high and undaunted courage and gifted with muscles of iron, have been remarkably successful in founding colonies; and this success can be attributed chiefly to their great adaptability to self-government. They absorb within themselves all other families of the same race, and those who refuse to assimilate are either driven out or wither and decay under the overshadowing influence of a more active civilization.

THE ANGLO-AMERICAN RACE.

Assimilation and absorption constitute the essential characteristics of the people now inhabiting our country. The Spaniards made settlements in Florida, the French in South Carolina and Louisiana, the Swedes on the Delaware, and the Hollanders in New Amsterdam; but all these once prosperous colonists have become absorbed by their more active neighbors, and now it is hard to distinguish between the descendants of the phlegmatic Dutchman or the simple-hearted Swedes and those of the Britons. San Augustine, in Florida, the oldest town in the United States, is little better than a ruin, and the only cause of the prosperity of Charleston and New York is the infusion of the more vigorous blood of the Saxon and the Celt. Again, in 1763 a chain of French forts and trading-posts extended from the Niagara to the mouth of the Mississippi, but the descendants of the old French colonists have so intermingled with the settlers from the more northern parts of Europe that very little distinct trace of the Gallic blood can be found.

The early emigration to the Western World was conducted on the society and land-company system, and hence arose many of the difficulties both internal and external in the colonies, among which may be mentioned the obstinate endeavors of the German settlers to preserve the customs of their old homes and their resistance to English schools; but now they have assimilated and cannot be distinguished from the descendants of the Anglo-Saxon and the Celt. The Constitution of the United States was intended to combine in one harmonious whole these dissimilar colonies; but, had the system of colonization by societies continued, no one can tell into how many discordant and belligerent States our country at the present time would have been divided. Providentially the system changed. Through the general distress caused in Europe by the wars of the French revolution and the consequent disruption of society and of families, the emigration by individuals commenced. The subsequent extensive application of steam both to land and sea carriage increased the means of locomotion, and by bringing together the natives of different countries in large masses tended to break down the barriers of language and prejudice. In this way the people of our country have formed a race of their own—the Anglo-American—speaking the same language, the English, but combining all the best qualities of the different white races now assimilating and forming a homogeneous whole.

The energy of the Anglo-American race is remarkably observable when the decay of the red man is studied; this subject needs no amplification, for the fact is fully proved from the circumstance that at the present time our Government is embarrassed with the difficulties of the treatment of the Indian tribes, and cannot decide which of the many plans proposed shall be adopted to delay their extinction and render it the least painful.

THE AFRICAN A DISTURBING ELEMENT.

Through man's avarice and the desire to facilitate the opening of the boundless forests and the cultivation of the rich virgin soil, the African was stolen from his native jungle and transported to the colonies of the New World—a fatal measure, sowing dragon's teeth; and no Cadmus could have anticipated the crop of armed men which actually sprung up in the irrepressible conflict between the sections of our once happy country, bringing on a civil war the like of which the world had never before seen and inflicting heavy penalties both upon the white and the black man. And this happened, not because the African was by nature aggressive and a disturber of the public peace, but from other causes. Indeed the negro was peculiarly docile, impressionable, and emotional, readily accommodating himself to our habits, civilization, and religion. But the real cause of his being a disturbing element in the body-politic arose from his physical differences and his incapacity of assimilation with the white race, and hence he was held in bondage by the superior man. If he had belonged to our own race, does any one believe that his shackles would not have fallen off when the Declaration of our Independence was promulgated?

IMPOLICY OF INTRODUCING THE CHINESE.

With these warnings and examples before us, it seems astounding that men—some actuated by mistaken humanitarian ideas, others impelled by a greedy desire for gain—will insist on importing Chinese into our country, since this short-sighted policy will only bring ruin and destruction upon us. We are all familiar with the mental and physical characteristics of the African, but very little is known about the Chinese except by residents on our Pacific coast. A careful study, however, of their peculiarities will show that they are unfit to become even residents of the American Republic.

THE CHINESE AT HOME.

The Chinese are of a sickly white or light-yellow color, with coarse, glossy, lank, black hair, and thin, scanty, black beards. Their eyes are invariably black, and apparently oblique, owing to the internal corners being more acute than in the white race. Their faces are remarkably round, with high cheek-bones and small, much depressed noses, and thick lips. The women are disproportionately small in size, and, with their broad upper face, low nose, and linear eyes, possess little beauty, and in fact are quite the reverse of handsome.

These are the characteristics of a subject, servile race; and the Chinese in fact for over six hundred years have been slaves of the Tartars, to whom even in remote times they paid tribute. Unable to relieve themselves by their own exertions from their cruel enemies, they called in the assistance of Kubla Khan and his fierce Mongols; but by this course they simply placed themselves under a more arbitrary oppressor, who subjugated them with cruel slaughter. During the ensuing century several insurrections broke out, only to be quelled with great loss of life; but at last the Mongols were expelled.

The Chinese, however, were not able to maintain themselves before the Tartars, and the warlike Manchus with a small force subdued the entire country, devastating the sea-coast and effectually crushing out all resistance. As a sign of submission, the Manchus compelled them to adopt the national Tartar mode of shaving the front of the head and of braiding the hair in a long cue. This order was resisted, and many suffered decapitation rather than part with their hair, but the mandate was gradually enforced, and for two centuries this degrading sign of conquest has been one of the distinguishing marks of a Chinaman. This condition of abject servitude still exists, and the present rulers, from the Emperor downward, exercise irresponsible autocratic powers, making the government an absolute despotism of the worst kind.

THEIR INGRAINED DUPLICITY.

Consequently the effect upon the subject race is highly injurious and destructive of all moral qualities. The arbitrary power of the officials has rendered falsehood absolutely necessary as a means of escape from oppressive burdens, unjust punishments and extortions. The rapacity of the magistrates compels the people to resort to every kind of subterfuge, and hence the spirit of duplicity has become ingrained in the Chinese, who exhibit all the vices of a people forced to resort to low cunning as a means of carrying out their schemes. In order to retain the mastery, the Manchu rulers have established a system of surveillance and isolation, and the natural effect has been to crush out all honorable feeling among the Chinese. A cold selfishness is the prime motive of their actions, and all sense of justice, truth, honesty, and natural affection is destroyed.

IGNORANT, SUPERSTITIOUS, AND ATHEISTS.

The Chinese are also an ignorant people, as the practical difficulties of their language are very great. There are at least 25,000 different characters sanctioned by polite usage, while the entire number is placed as high as 261,000. The burden of remembering so many complicated symbols whose form, sound, and meanings must all be understood, is so great that a life-time is consumed in acquiring an education, and the result is valueless. Only three men in one hundred and only one woman in a thousand can read works written in the classic style. The books teach little worth knowing except maxims of morality long reduced to actual practice by the western nations, but neglected and forgotten by the Chinese; and the histories only furnish a warning against the results of a false system and a vicious policy.

They are grossly superstitious, believing in the efficacy of magical arts of the most revolting description, and they have no religion except the worship of the tablets of Confucius and of their individual ancestors. Having no moral sense of right and wrong, they are practical atheists, determined suicides, and systematic infanticides. They do not observe any weekly day of rest, and, in their worship, beat gongs, ring bells, explode fire-crackers, and burn paper petitions. They use praying-machines and expend immense sums in the repair of temples and in the purchase of idols in which they do not believe. Their form of oath consists in cutting off a chicken's head—a symbol that a like fate awaits the false witness—but there is no solemn appeal to a supreme being who will punish him either here or hereafter.

This description is not overdrawn, for a prominent missionary who has been living in close intimacy with this people for over forty years likens Chinese society to a stagnant pool fermenting in its own feculence, whose torpor is only disturbed by the monstrous things its own heat generates, and becoming more and more polluted casts up nothing but mire and dirt.

RANCOROUS HOSTILITY TO FOREIGNERS.

The most striking traits of the Chinese, however, are exhibited in their intercourse with other countries, and their odious superstitions have been proved beyond the possibility of doubt by their bitter, ineradicable hostility to the western nations and especially by their savage attacks upon foreign residents.

The Chinese Empire, surrounded by lofty snow-covered mountains, impenetrable jungles, and artificial walls, has from time immemorial been the symbol of bigoted exclusiveness. With these barriers, the intercourse with foreigners, confined to the frontiers and the sea-coast, was merely commercial, and was conducted on principles degrading to the pride of the western nations; and history furnishes a curious and melancholy record of ill-requited obsequiousness before insolent barbarian lackeys. The early embassies were subjected to humiliations and the embassadors were guarded like criminals, treated like beggars, and entertained like mountebanks. In later times, the grievances became more serious. The loading of ships was delayed, goods were stolen, crews were maltreated, underlings were extortionate, and access to the high authorities for complaint and redress was denied. The dealings with foreigners were conducted in the spirit of a government proclamation that the fankwei—that is, the "foreign devils"—are like beasts and not to be treated like the natives.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES EXTORTED BY FORCE.

The modern relations between China and the western nations have been almost exclusively commercial, but the treaties were not negotiated by pure diplomacy, they were rather extorted by an overpowering exhibition of force. The principal disagreements arose from the persistent refusals of the officials to redress grievances, and their obstinate denial of access to the Emperor. From these causes a state of war continued from 1836 to 1860, when, in consequence of the capture of Peking and the sacking of the Emperor's summer palace, the Chinese granted to foreign embassadors the right to reside at the capital, and also opened twenty-one ports to trade. During this period of twenty-four years of war several commercial treaties were negotiated by Great Britain, the principal belligerent, and other powers, including the United States, were admitted to similar privileges. These treaties, however, were wrung from the Chinese by fear, and were not obtained through a sense of reciprocal advantage, since all they desire is to work out their own destiny in their own way—that is, simply to retrograde and to relapse into barbarism. They made small concessions to avert great demands, and their whole struggle was and continues to be against making any concessions at all.

THE BURLINGAME TREATY.

After this effectual chastisement of their barbarian arrogance, the Chinese, with characteristic duplicity modified their policy, and dreading the return of the fleets and armies of the western nations, adopted the plan of conducting negotiations at the capitals of the Christian powers, and to effect that purpose sent out Mr. Anson Burlingame and two Chinese envoys of the second rank on a roving diplomatic mission. From this source originated the famous Burlingame treaty of 1868, the effects of which have so recently been complained of. Under this treaty the citizens of the United States residing in China enjoy the same privileges in respect to travel and residence as may be there enjoyed by citizens and subjects of the most favored nations, and reciprocally the Chinese in the United States are entitled to similar privileges.

But, although the language of the treaty is identical in establishing the rights of the citizens of one country in the dominions of the other, yet the actual concessions are by no means identical; for in China the citizens of the most favored nation have no rights of residence except within certain narrow limits at the treaty ports, while in the United States citizens of all nations can reside where they please and travel anywhere without molestation. The treaty also provided for the introduction of railroads and telegraph lines, but this concession could only have been intended for the benefit of speculators and not of the people of the United States.

After concluding this treaty at Washington the mission proceeded to Europe; but in consequence of the profound distrust of Chinese professions entertained by the western nations Mr. Burlingame was unsuccessful in further negotiations, and the pretended objects of the embassy were effectually frustrated by his sudden death under circumstances casting suspicion on his Chinese colleagues.

THE TIEN-TSIN MASSACRE.

A few months had hardly elapsed after Mr. Burlingame's sudden death when this incredulity of Chinese professions was strikingly confirmed by the news of the horrible massacre at Tien-Tsin, June 21, 1870. This fearful tragedy deepened the impression of the ignorance and superstitions of the Chinese, of their dark and hideous crimes, and of their bitter hatred of foreigners. The atrocities of this outbreak were almost too fiendish for belief. Aided and abetted by the authorities, the Chinese mob murdered and then mutilated the French consul and several French priests, civilians, and servants, burned down the consulate, the mission church and hospital, and tortured the Sisters of Charity to death in the most horrible manner, cutting their bodies into small pieces and distributing the fragments among the rioters. Over twenty Europeans perished in this ferocious onset which, since its causes are still operative, may at any time be repeated. No regret or sorrow was felt by the Chinese; and the murderers who, under the pressure of a threatened retaliation, were executed for this savage crime, have been canonized as martyrs in a holy cause. Since then, with the evident motive to incite the populace against foreigners, large highly-colored pictures representing this massacre have been exhibited at Chinese fairs, and threatening placards are continually appearing on the walls of Pekin and the treaty ports. Attacks on missionaries and consuls are of frequent occurrence, and a general apprehension is always prevailing that a wide-spread plot for the extermination of all foreigners is on the eve of breaking out.

THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.

Having described the characteristics of the Chinese in their own country, I shall now direct attention to that race on our Pacific coast.

At the present time there are in California 150,000 Chinese, of whom 50,000 live in San Francisco; and the steamers from Shanghai and Hong Kong are weekly bringing over immense numbers in addition. The alarm excited by this invasion is wide-spread, and the aid of Congress is invoked to put a stop to this influx of semi-barbarians now threatening to outnumber the white population of the Pacific coast, imperiling their best interests and endangering the existence of free institutions. Entertaining a deadly hatred of the whites, being of a distinct race, they can never become homogeneous with the people of our country. They will neither learn our language nor adopt our manners, customs, and beliefs, only eighty converts of doubtful Christianity being the result of twenty years of missionary labor in San Francisco. Pagans in religion, they hold in contempt the oaths and solemn proceedings of our courts of justice, and establish secret tribunals of their own, enforcing their decrees even to the taking away of life. With the exception of a few merchants the great mass pay no taxes, and the burden of their support in asylums, hospitals, and prisons falls upon our citizens.

FREE INSTITUTIONS ENDANGERED.

From ignorance they are unable to perform either civil or military duties. They cannot serve as jurors in the courts, as soldiers in the Army, or as sailors in the Navy. Should the country be invaded they would be perfectly useless for purposes of defense, and the enemy would have in them a corps of cunning spies more than ready to sell their information. They will not conform to sanitary and police regulations, and live miserably, crowded together in filth and wretchedness, eaten up by horrible diseases. From their carelessness in handling fire terrible conflagrations break out in their over-populated dens and devastate the neighborhood.

THE CHINA QUARTER ABOMINATIONS.

The China quarter in San Francisco has driven off the old white residents from the vicinity, and put a stop to improvements; it is a hiding-place for shame, filth, crime, disease, and abject poverty, and every town on the Pacific coast is cursed with similar abominations.

They have no domestic life worthy of the name, the sacred relations of husband and wife being almost wholly disregarded. The women are nearly all slaves in condition and prostitutes by vocation, and the men, substantially the bondsmen of the six companies, are abandoned and dangerous criminals, opium smokers, and gamblers.

DESTRUCTION OF LABOR INTERESTS.

They have monopolized menial labor and many of the lighter mechanic arts, thus depriving American boys and girls of opportunities of employment, closing the avenues of labor, and driving many to enforced idleness and want, resulting in confirmed poverty and crime. They have robbed women of work which afforded them an honest and virtuous independence and have compelled many to resort to doubtful means of support. They have taken the place of tens of thousands of white men who would have immigrated to the Pacific States and who would have bought farms, built houses, raised families, and supported numerous dependents.

The fatal and unwise policy of corporations in importing and employing Chinese of the lowest caste has turned in our direction a stream of undesirable immigrants which, unless checked, will in a short time overflow the Pacific coast and reduce that region to a condition of barbarism. Had these corporations employed white laborers, at the present time in the Pacific States there would be thousands of homesteads occupied by able-bodied fathers of families, cultivating the soil and building up for the railroads an immense business in the transportation of farm products. Instead of securing these substantial and enduring benefits, these corporations imported a vast army of Asiatics, who remit their earnings to China and send to that country for the clothes they wear and even for the food they eat. Instead of introducing permanent settlers, these companies brought in upon us the very lowest of the low classes of a semi-barbarous people with ineradicable vices and prejudices.

WIDE-SPREAD ALARM ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

The people of the Pacific coast regard these hordes with fear and alarm, believing that superiority of race and intelligence will probably not be able to resist such overwhelming superiority of numbers. They love their own wives and children, their own families and homes, their own country and laws, better than the interests of Asiatic aliens, and insist that, if the trade with China cannot be secured except at the expense of the comfort and happiness and welfare of the American people, it must be relinquished, no matter how profitable it may be to a very few. They have of themselves endeavored to remedy the evil by the passage of laws calculated to prevent the introduction of lewd and debauched woman, convicted criminals, and helpless paupers, while permitting the immigration of persons who will add to the industrial classes of the community.

THE ADVERSE DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT.
